I represent a constituency which contains a nuclear power station employing 600 people. What will happen to communities such as Trawsfynydd if the climate of opinion in Britain means that we will not invest in a massive replacement of the Magnox generation? We may not build AGRs and we will certainly not build PWRs. There is an objection on the Opposition Benches, and by many Conservative Members, to constructing PWRs in Britain, whatever the Sizewell inquiry recommends. What will happen to communities, many in areas of high unemployment, which are dependent upon the nuclear industry? The Government and the Opposition must face that question. We must ensure that jobs are maintained in those areas. We want assurances now about jobs in areas such as Trawsfynydd which have the old Magnox stations which face decommissioning. We must tackle the issue now, not defer it until 1990 or 1995.

8.34 pm

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Conservation has been mentioned several times tonight, not least by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn). It is appropriate in this debate to say that we are products of our environment. I was at university during the late 1960s and early 1970s, when there was great concern about conservation of the environment and the safety of the civil nuclear industry. The two, of course, are inextricably linked.

In succeeding years it is not surprising that, in the battle for our very economic survival, those issues have been pushed into a backwater inhabited mainly by the far Left and political eccentrics. It is no less surprising that, now that the success of the Government's economic policies has given the country sustained growth and low inflation, there should once again be more talk about the environment, and I welcome that. I especially welcome the efforts of my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment, Countryside and Local Government to ensure that the Conservative party dons its rightful mantle as the conservor of and carer for our environment.

We have to make two decisions on the nuclear industry —on Sizewell and on the disposal of nuclear waste— that raise fundamental issues about the future of our nuclear policy and concern about our environment. We are standing as it were on the threshold of a busy thoroughfare —traffic is coming towards us at great speed from the left and the right. I do not argue that we should stand still for ever or that we should vegetate on one spot, but we should stop, think, look and, above all, listen. I echo the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) — it is time to pause for reflection.

There is no overwhelming urgency about either decision. There is no rule requiring elected, accountable — and, it must be said, disposable — Ministers to proceed at the behest of an unelected and unaccountable body such as NIREX, and to do so at a rapid pace. Much as we regret the publicity surrounding Sellafield—unfair as much of it may be—much as we regret the disaster at Chernobyl and much as it may be true that we rejected that design of reactor many years ago, public confidence in the nuclear industry has been shaken. We cannot ignore that fact.

I listened with great respect and care to my hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth), and I agreed with much of what he said. However, the fact is that public confidence has been shaken. The incident at Chernobyl has proved the argument put forward for many years by those of us in the National Council for Civil Defence against official complacency and for more resources to be put into civil defence. The radioactive cloud that drifted towards Lincoln did not part like the Red sea when it appeared over the nuclear-free city—it carried on. We need effective civil defence, whatever our civil or military nuclear policies.

I do not believe that it is statesmenlike or resolute to fly in the face of public concern about the nuclear industry and to proceed regardless, without pausing for reflection. That is merely foolish. In a few days, 12,000 of my constituents —who were not given much time by the Government for consultation—signed a petition collected by West Lindsey district council objecting to the disposal of waste in Humberside and Lincolnshire. Barring a handful, they are not Greenpeace activists or flower-shaking dropouts —they are decent folk from villages and small towns who are both worried and concerned, and to whose views the Government should listen with sympathy and concern. They need reassurance.

I am the first to welcome the Government's decision to restrict the disposal of nuclear waste in shallow trenches to low-level waste. I know that we are now talking in terms of overalls and the like used in the nuclear industry and in hospitals. I know that the risks are small and I welcome the Government's concession, but I and my constituents need to be told the facts in full. My constituents need even more reassurance. Until they receive it, I cannot support the Government by voting for NIREX to be given powers to drill in either South Killingholme or Fulbeck.

I repeat what I have said before in the House: that we in Lincolnshire cannot merely say, "Put nuclear waste anywhere, except on our doorsteps, please." No Government can govern on that basis, ignoring the national interest. Ultimately, waste must be put in the best, that is the safest, geological site. The moral is clear, and has been pointed out by my hon and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyell) and my hon.

[Mr. Edward Leigh]

Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg): Do as the Swedes do at Forsmark; put it in mines under the sea. Obviously, that is expensive, but if we are to have a successful, progressive nuclear industry, it must enjoy public confidence. As my hon. Friend the Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Hickmet) said clearly, if we ignore the need for consent by the local population, we may put our entire nuclear industry at risk. No expense can be spared in ensuring that confidence.

I know that the volume of waste is large. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment talked about its being equivalent to eight Victoria towers in the Palace of Westminster. Would he like eight Victoria towers of low-level nuclear waste in his Mole Valley constituency or next door? We cannot ignore or despise public concern. My right hon. Friend mentioned the date 2010 when the Drigg site will be full. Does that not give us time for pause and reflection?

There is a perfectly good case to be made for the continued survival and growth of our nuclear industry in terms of the need for abundant and cheap energy to ensure our competitiveness. During the past 10 years, no fatality has been directly attributed to the nuclear industry in this country. It is necessary not to depend on militants in the coalfields, and the desirability of a four-fuel economy.

Safe nuclear power can legitimately be defended as better for the environment and for conservation than traditional coal-guzzling power stations. However, the analogy of standing on the edge of a busy road holds good. I beg the Government not to rush decisions, but to conduct a massive campaign, not of propaganda, but of information, and to reflect on the words written by William Deedes this weekend. When he was the Minister of Information in the 1963 Government, he was asked to conduct a massive campaign of information, not propaganda, on joining the European Community.

No expense should be spared on the campaign to explain patiently and at length where we are now and where we are going. If necessary, we should put the declared outcome of that consultation exercise in the manifesto, and let the people decide. That is fair, honourable, democratic and popular, and I commend it to the House.

8.42 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I shall concentrate on the central issue of the debate, which is nuclear waste disposal. The spine of the debate seems to be a commitment by the Government to get waste disposal dumps under way, preferably cheaply, and certainly as quickly as possible.

The Government seem committed to that because they see it as a prelude, first to the expansion of the reprocessing industry, as if it were Britain's destiny to act as the nuclear laundry for the rest of the world, and, secondly, to an expansion of the nuclear programme. The Government see the problem of nuclear waste as a bottleneck delaying both expansions. There is no need for that impetuous commitment. The waste can be stored and Drigg is not full and has many years of service to come. The CEGB will do whatever it is told regarding storage. There is no need for this rush, but the Government are committed to it.

The Environment Select Committee has shown clearly what is wrong. Theirs is the first considered strategy with an intellectual base of research which has been presented to us. It is the first basic rethink on dumping and reprocessing. In Committeespeak, which is always fairly guarded, a strong case has been made out against both. The two are closely interconnected, whatever Ministers may say, because reprocessing produces 70 per cent. or more of the low-level waste involved. I have received confused answers from the Department of the Environment. One states that waste and reprocessed material will be placed in the dumps, and another states that they will not be, yet the answers were only six weeks apart. The two problems are interconnected.

The Select Committee's report is so good that it certainly should have been considered before any special development order on nuclear dumping sites is laid. It would be unforgivable to put the SDO first. Yet the Government are, in effect, doing just that. This is an inadequate half-baked reply to the report. We should be dealing with the report as a whole today, not merely with the little bits to which the Government have chosen to reply. The report hangs together as a whole and presents a considered new approach to the Government's strategy.

The Government, by replying to the report in bits, are changing their justifications for their nuclear waste programme, which is to continue. They are more apologetic about it, but it must continue. They make sympathetic noises about Chernobyl but they are to soldier on with their commitment as if nothing had happened.

The Government's reply deals with only 13 of the 43 recommendations, and three of those recommendations are dealt with by half-baked responses, such as that "serious consideration should be given" to the matter. Only one recommendation has been accepted: to exclude intermediate-level waste from trench dumpings. The Government have ignored the recommendations on deep geological disposal, on dose limitations for the public, which I would have thought was central to the location and nature of the dumps, on reprocessing, on institutional responsibility, on co-ordination, on transport, on research and development and on the public.

To ignore all that is to produce a silly, shabby strategy which does not interfere with the Government's onward rush to nuclear dumping. It has led to an inadequate reply, and a messy debate tonight, because we have been mixing Chernobyl and Killingholme, CND and questions about the Select Committee's report, as if they were all one great glorious mess. The Government, backed by a three-line Whip, will refuse to change and smuggle through their rejection of what the Select Committee recommends them to do. The Government have treated the Select Committee with contempt. Their real concern is to get on with the special development order.

Mr. Michael Brown: Will the hon. Gentleman comment on the rumour, and seek reassurance from the Government Front Bench, that that SDO may be laid within hours?

Mr. Mitchell: I hope that that is not so, and that the Front Bench will assure us that it is not so. It would be a dirty trick of the first magnitude to follow this inadequate debate with an SDO. The Select Committee report has knocked away the intellectual basis of the Government's policy, yet the Government persevere with their policy.

As soon as the SDO is laid, blight will begin on the four areas affected. The mere mention of the SDO means blight in terms of development, house prices and prospects, which will continue throughout the long period of research and examination until the eventual decision. That blight will be foisted on those areas without proper consultation, against the wishes of the inhabitants, and without any intellectual justification.

The Government are not doing several things mentioned in the report. It said that the Department of the Environment must be able to demonstrate to the public that the sites were selected logically and systematically. The Government will not tell us whether that is so, because they will not tell us the basis for the selection. How can local authorities object to the selection when they do not know its basis? How can they argue in those circumstances?

The report states that people need to know that the choice of their area is not simply the result of some quirk or quite extraneous factor, such as site ownership. Yet the choice is based on site ownership. It is convenient that either the Government or a NIREX partner owns all four sites. That is why South Killingholme has been picked. It is not suitable in any other way than that it is convenient for the Government because they burnt their fingers with ICI on Teeside and do not want to be in that situation again. The Minister admitted that that was the case in his presentation of the NIREX letter to the House.

The report says that the Department should shortlist, but it will not do so. It prefers to accept that work from NIREX. The report says that the Department should not go for the cheap option, but it is doing so. This is a cheap and nasty option, which is used in very few other countries. Are Sweden, Germany and other countries less immune to radiation than we are? Why have so many other countries refused to go for the option which the Department is trying to foist on us—a most dangerous option?

The report says that alpha emitters should be excluded from the waste. The Department says that there will be "very small" quantities of alpha emitters, of toxic wastes and of trace elements. It is not observing what the report wants. In other words, the Department of the Environment, in its reply to the Select Committee on the Environment, is abandoning its responsibility to protect the environment and serve the people who live in that environment. It is acting as if it were the political arm of NIREX, not a Department with responsibility for people and the environment. It has a higher destiny, role and responsibility than that.

There have been massive evasions and sudden changes in the basis of the dumping programme. The exclusion of intermediate-level wastes shows that the Department has not even thought the business through before starting the decision-making process. My constituency and those of other hon. Members where dumping is threatened get no benefit from the nuclear programme. I know that some hon. Members have said that these areas will get nuclear power, but so will London, and it is not argued that the dump should be placed in London, which uses so much of the power. No one has asked to be blighted in this way. Ministers simply want to get something—anything—decided.

What has been done in the nuclear dumping programme is foolish, unjustifiable and unforgiveable. It will not be forgiven, and it certainly will not be accepted.

8.53 pm

Sir Trevor Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): There is one consolation in speaking towards the end of the debate—one can look over the labyrinth of the hours and meditate. One finds that the abolitionists have been at work. Some wish for the destruction of THORP—the thermal oxide reprocessing plant—at Sellafield, and of the nuclear fuel cycle. BNFL has secured overseas contracts worth £2·5 billion, all of which would be liable to be lost. Much of the cost of THORP has been paid for by the customers, and there are 50,000 jobs involved in BNFL investment, all of which will go by the board.

Some questions should be raised. We are likely to approach the end of the century with an incomplete electricity capacity. At the moment, we have 9,029 megawatts of nuclear capacity, and replacement is required not merely for the de-commissioning of the Magnox reactors in the 1990s but for the retirement of certain coal-fired power stations, and for the expansion of demand. I cannot see, with the long lead time involved —eight years or more—that the construction of suitable capacity by 2000 AD can be achieved. The Minister will have to work that out himself.

This has been a debate on many topics, and I know that the special development orders will come later. I hope that many of our remarks will be fully debated in about a week's time.

The Chernobyl reactors have serious defects and the Parliamentary and Scientific Committee has given an analysis to its members of what caused the trouble in the one that exploded. How can we incriminate an industry in the United Kingdom upon the chance destruction of one Russian reactor, when some 370 reactors are operating in 25 countries and have been performing reasonably well over the past 30 years? The nuclear industry is under the shadow of political paralysis. A serious industry has become a plaything of political expediency. Confidence must be rebuilt, but not destroyed on the evidence of a single example. That would be like people saying that, because one house has burnt down, there will be devastation across the country. That is not the case.

If we have a nuclear industry, we must do something about it. The economics of necessity projected France into the nuclear age, and political expediency has bequeathed lost opportunities to the United Kingdom. The commercial reactors were first commissioned in the United Kingdom in 1962, and in France in 1965, but 24 years later, of total electricity, some 65 per cent. is generated by nuclear power in France and only 20 per cent. in the United Kingdom. For Belgium the figure is 60 per cent., for Sweden 43 per cent. and for Scotland—where power is cheaper than in England—some 40 per cent.

The total number of reactors worldwide is 374, plus another 150 under construction. Are we going to say that, because of an accident in one Russian reactor, of a type that we do not accept in the West, that had broken all the rules in the books—rules that we in the West do not break because we realise that precautions have to be taken —we have committed such a grave error?

I felt that the report of the Select Committee on the Environment would have been more balanced, and less one-sided, if it had been put together with the Select Committee on Energy. Perhaps there is no precedent for this, but my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy may have something to say. My right hon. Friend has already made a useful concession in that low-level waste only is to be included in the chosen of these optional sites. It will be recollected that Bedfordshire asked for consideration of sites additional to that at Elstow. There are now four sites, so why are some hon. Members against all four of them?

The four sites must be compared on their merits. One option may be accepted, or all four may be rejected. The acceptable site, in judgment, is likely to be on the coast or on property owned by the Ministry of Defence, property that may be remote from the population centres, and therefore more acceptable than a site close to a population centre, as in Bedford. The report on the best practicable environmental options from the Department of the Environment says:

"It must therefore be concluded that near-surface disposal is the BPEO for over 80 per cent. by volume of all the waste considered."

I hope that the House will consider that point, even though part of the waste has been eliminated.

Hon. Members should bear in mind that more than 50 per cent. of the waste comes from the nuclear industry but from hospitals, industrial establishments, and so on. I hope that they will bear in mind also that, because of the strict rules which have been laid down, the risk of a fatality occurring in the nuclear industry is one in 1 million, compared with the risk at work of one in 40,000 and the risk from an accident in the home of one in 20,000.

We must be constructive if we are to have any sort of nuclear policy in the United Kingdom. It is not much good destroying everything in sight and hoping that we can create another industry out of the ashes. We have been told that there are alternative energy sources—that we could utilise that waste in the sea, but we do not know how to do that and that windmills could dot the countryside, like our population, but we do not know whether that approach will succeed in meeting United Kingdom requirements.

All over the globe nuclear power stations operate safely and there is no reason to suppose at this stage that great difficulties will arise anywhere, except perhaps in the Soviet Union. There was not a single death in the Three Mile Island incident in the United States. We should consider the number of miners in the pits and the numbers who have tried to extract black oil from the North sea who have been killed.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Trevor Skeet: No, Sir. I have only a short time to speak and I must bear in mind my colleagues' requirements.

By considering the matter in a balanced way and taking the positive approach, one sees the nuclear industry in an entirely different light. Let us have wisdom, not folly.

9 pm

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Labour's amendment calls for a safer industry, and I wholeheartedly agree. I am conscious of the fact that in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) and in my constituency 22,500 people are either directly or indirectly dependent on the nuclear industry. I say to those of my hon. Friends who call for the industry's closure that putting those people on the dole, over the space of a couple of years, would have a catastrophic effect. West Cumberland could not support such unemployment, and no hon. Member has the right to impose so many redundancies on my constituents.

We in west Cumberland have been led to believe that our economy was to be built on the basis of a civil nuclear programme. My right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) made crucial decisions under a Labour Government, which included ordering two power stations. He made an even more crucial decision to develop a reprocessing plant in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland. In the past seven years, that £1·4 billion project has transformed west Cumberland's infrastructure and industrial development.

Only last week in my constituency I attended the opening of a factory which is devoted to the development of nuclear power. About 40 per cent. of its orders come from just one project, THORP. That is the real world in which we must live. It is unreasonable for any Government to lay out a pattern of industrial development in constituencies such as mine and Copeland, and then, because of a series of incidents at Sellafield, which arose only because of management's incompetence, and because of a stupid series of decisions in the Soviet Union, which lead to the construction of the RBMK plant—which everyone now says is unsafe—seven years later place a huge question mark over the future of employment in west Cumberland.

The recommendation of some to close the reprocessing plant at Sellafield is out. We cannot proceed on that basis. The industry itself has recognised that it is necessary to tighten up. Over the years I have seen massive investment in the nuclear power industry in west Cumberland to reduce discharges. About £450 million has been invested in three plants which are now coming on stream. By 1991, a £150 million investment will be in place in the Floc precipitation plant, which will dramatically reduce discharges. Alpha emitters will drop from 5,000 curies a year in 1973 to 20 a year by 1991. Beta emitters will drop from 200,000 in 1973 to 8,000 in 1991. This will make it one of the safest civil nuclear processing plants in the world. It is on that basis that I say to the House that we should be very careful when we consider the recommendations that are being made in some quarters. The problem is that people do not realise, understand or recognise the massive investment that is taking place to reduce the level of discharge from the nuclear industry.

I want to comment on the confused debate that takes place about the nuclear industry. The confusion that has arisen from statements that have been made by Ministers, the industry and lobbies outside over the years has led to a series of errors in the way in which people in responsible positions present their case. Too often, those errors have led to lies that have been propagated in all quarters. Too often the lie, in turn, has been manipulated to become the propaganda of the day. The problem is that the industry is riddled with misrepresentations and it is very hard to know where to start to re-establish the truth.

I have been to meetings where I have heard things said which I know have been untrue. When I have challenged them, I have been howled down by people who insist on living by the misrepresentation. In that climate of hysteria it is impossible to get over a decent and reasonable argument about the industry. I have even gone to meetings where I have misrepresented the facts, not deliberately, but because I have been misled by people whom I regarded as responsible authorities.

There was the statement by the Energy Minister in 1983, which was referred to by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield. When the Minister was asked whether there was a connection between the Central Electricity Generating Board's nuclear power station and the manufacture of nuclear weapons, he said:

"There is no such connection. No plutonium produced in any of the CEGB's nuclear power stations has ever been used for military purposes in this country, and there are no plans to use it thus in the future. Further, no plutonium from the CEGB nuclear programme has ever been exported for use in weapons." —[Official Report, 4 February 1983; Vol. 36, c. 206.]

We now know that that is not true. I have been telling people that that is the truth. How can we, who actually believe in the industry, be credible when we accept statements from the Minister at the Dispatch Box in good faith which turn out to be untrue in the course of inquiry, in this case the Sizewell inquiry?

When Lord Marshall was asked during the television programme "TV Eye" whether the plutonium had been used for military purposes, he replied:

"I don't know what it was used for, but it has gone into the military stockpile. There is no secret about that."

I received an indignant letter the other day from a constituent who cannot understand why we are so inconsistent. He said:

"I want to draw your attention to the article in 'Sanity' about the diversion to the military stockpile of plutonium produced in the CEGB civil reactors. I am outraged that in order to support its case for building a second reactor at Sizewell the CEGB's chief witness, John Baker, committed perjury, at least, if, as I presume, his evidence was on oath or affirmation. I feel this is a matter for the Director of Public Prosecutions."

He went on to talk about his further outrage at the fact that "the Report by the Inspector of the Sizewell Public Inquiry is bound to consider only evidence there presented."

He pleaded with me to raise this matter in the House, and I am doing so.

There are many people in my constituency who feel as strongly as that. They want to know why the case is being misrepresented in this way. I appeal to the Secretary of State. We want an open, honest and honourable regime, where all the facts are made available. It is only in that climate that we can win the argument. I say to the Secretary of State that unless that climate is created in the United Kingdom, we shall never win that argument, and in the end we shall lose the industry.

9.9 pm

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): This debate takes place in the shadow of the Chernobyl disaster. However, in the few remaining minutes available, I should like to try to broaden it out into a consideration of whether we should continue with our nuclear programme, and look at the matter on a world basis.

I have been disappointed by some of the parochialism in the contributions to the debate, particularly by the Labour party, which used to be the party of internationalism. The supply and demand for energy in this country is only a small part of the global picture. There is little doubt that the population of the world will more than double some time in the next century before it finally stabilises. The energy requirements of the developing world will increase even faster than that. The economic growth that those countries will need to feed themselves and provide themselves with the basic necessities will require energy.

Most of the responsible studies that I have seen suppose that the global demand for energy will more than double in the next 25 years, even with the most optimistic projections on conservation. I do not see, and I have not heard during the debate, how we can get through the next 25 years without nuclear energy.

Hon. Members have said that coal will play a major part. It is true that the same studies suppose that part of the gap will be closed by the additional production and use of coal, but can we continue to plunder the earth of its fossil fuels? Apart from anything else, coal, oil and gas create their own pollution. We have heard about acid rain and the ash produced by coal-fired power stations. We have heard how the combustion of fossil fuels uses up oxygen and produces carbon dioxide. We have heard about the possible greenhouse effect, with the heating up of the planet and the consequential melting of the polar ice caps. I wish that some of the enthusiasts for the coal industry would give equal attention to some of the long-term effects of the industry that they so enthusiastically champion.

Perhaps this is the main point. Fossil fuels are exhaustible. Will we pass on to future generations an earth that has been stripped of its easily accessible fossil fuels; an earth with a teaming population with a voracious appetite for energy; an earth where we have denied people the technical means to produce the energy that they require?

That is why I support nuclear energy. It behoves the advanced industrial countries to make use of that form of power so that we can leave the fossil fuels to the less developed, poorer nations. It is not that nuclear energy is a magic solution. To me, it has always represented an opportunity, to be controlled, managed and harnessed. Of course there are risks, but some are very small. The routine, normal discharges from the nuclear power industry in this country contribute much less than 1 per cent. to the normal background radiation to which every one of us is exposed every day of our lives. That is certainly a great deal less damaging to health, and in every other way, than most other forms of industrial pollution.

I was a little nervous to hear my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment suggest that every untoward radiological emission from the nuclear power industry should be reported and published. Does he really mean every untoward unauthorised emission? If so, he must include the coal industry. As we all know, there is a great deal of uranium ore in coal, which comes out by way of ash. If, during the normal operation of a coal-fired power station, the dust suppressors or effluent scrubbers are not working, presumably on a day-to-day basis there is a steep rise in the amount of radiation coming out of the power station. Is the Secretary of State going to put such a requirement on that industry? I would like a response on that from my right hon. Friend or from any other hon. Member who believes that the nuclear industry is unique in that respect.

Of course routine emissions should be further reduced, but if we are rational, we realise that it is better, if we are interested in saving lives, to concentrate on the many other sources of avoidable accidents caused by cars, aeroplanes and dams.

[Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory]

The nuclear industry in this country is spending millions of pounds on reducing the number of cancer deaths resulting from emissions from the industry from two deaths a year to one death. That money would be better spent on finding a cure for cancer, because hundreds of thousands of people all over the world would be saved.

My main concern—I am sure it is the main concern of the population—is not about routine emissions, but about the possibility of a major disaster. Almost the worst possible kind of disaster happened at Chernobyl. That was worse than the incident at Three Mile Island, where the Kemeny report showed that no one was killed as a result of the accident. We do not know the whole story about Chernobyl, but I hope that we do learn the facts. I would guess that the final death toll from the long-term cancer effects of the Chernobyl disaster will be far less than the 2,000 people who died at Bhopal in India. I do not think that we should close down the world's chemical industry because of the Bhopal disaster; equally, I do not think that we should seriously contemplate closing down the world's nuclear industry because of one accident in a badly designed reactor in the Soviet Union.

The hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), in a brave speech, gave certain assurances about what a future Labour Government might do. In passing, he said that none of Britain's nuclear power stations was ordered by a Conservative Government. The corollary of that is, of course, that they were all ordered by a Labour Government. It is strange that Opposition Members have so dramatically shifted their position. If we are in a mess out of which we must get, it is a mess which the Opposition have created.

It is startling that the Opposition should flatly turn down the possibility of a programme of PWR reactors before the Sizewell report has been published. The Labour party is always keen to have commissions, reports and inquiries. However, it has turned down any recommendations that the Sizewell report might make, even before the scientific evidence has been sifted and published.

Of course, there are lessons for the United Kingdom to learn. The nuclear industry has the most to gain from maximum disclosure. It is my experience that the more people know about the industry, the more willing they are to replace emotion and suspicion with a rational assessment of the risks. There is a need for clear, timely and acceptable information of a technical nature and of a more simple kind that the man in the street can understand. If that means organisational changes at Government level, so be it.

When submitting parliamentary questions about the nuclear industry, I have found that they tend to be shifted and shunted around between the Department of Energy, the Department of the Environment and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. We must know who is responsible for what and who will publish the information.

The nuclear industry has the most to gain from being open and accessible. It is heartening that 180,000 people annually visit Britain's nuclear power stations and Sellafield. That is not enough. In France, 500,000 people visit nuclear power plants. As a result, it would seem that 60 per cent. of French people are in favour of their nuclear programme. Another factor may be that electricity in France is 20 per cent. cheaper than in Britain.

There are, of course, still technical, political and social hurdles to be cleared if we are to have a successful and continuing nuclear power programme. It is a paradox that although a great deal is known about the physics of radiation and the engineering aspects of radioactivity and although radiation is easy to detect and measure, the public still consider it to be mysterious.

We should not fall into the trap of leaving everything to the experts. The industry must create a partnership with the public and encourage maximum discussion. Some hon. Members have their own private reasons and interests for other ways of producing energy. Some are told what to say, and perhaps even what to think, by their trade union sponsors. But the rest of us have a duty to try to explain to the public the facts behind the industry. I endorse everything that has been said this evening about the need for maximum disclosure.

I end on a note of caution. In discussing this matter there is a danger that we will shift attention from what I consider to be the main threat to mankind — the proliferation of nuclear weapons. There is no direct correlation between a civil nuclear programme and a military nuclear programme. The fact that a country may possess a civil reactor does not enable it to produce weapons-grade plutonium. Similarly, the fact that a country does not possess a civil reactor does not, I am afraid, preclude it from obtaining enriched uranium or plutonium from a research reactor which is separate and distinct from any civil programme. That is the main danger.

We should be turning our attention to how we can encourage international inspection and increase the number of signatories to the non-proliferation treaty of 1968. Far too much concentration on the dangers of civil nuclear power leads to such facts being overlooked.

This has been a helpful debate, but we should never forget that the legacy that we must bequeath to the people is not one of an earth stripped of its fossil fuels. That would be far more dangerous than bequeathing to them the shorter term problem of the disposal of nuclear waste.

9.21 pm

Mr. Stanley Orme (Salford, East): The magnitude of the disaster at Chernobyl has focused public attention on the issue of nuclear power. Therefore, it is right that the debate has ranged across the whole issue of Britain's nuclear power programme—the reprocessing of waste and every other aspect. It would not be possible to separate the issues of radioactive waste disposal from the power programme that creates that waste.

Public perception of nuclear power has been changing over the past few years. The Sizewell B inquiry and the publicity over Sellafield have heightened public awareness. The disaster at Chernobyl has further increased public fears. That has been underlined by many hon. Members on both sides of the House in what has been an important debate this evening.

Opinion polls show that increasing numbers of people oppose any further development of nuclear power, and nothing that the Government have done or said has allayed those fears.

The Secretary of State lost no time in making his position clear in an article in the Daily Telegraph on Friday 2 May. He and his colleagues have launched a great deal of criticism at the Soviet Union for its lack of openness. He said:

"there would have been no disaster at Chernobyl had the Soviet Union followed the procedures of the democracies."

His predecessor, the right hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Howell), described the disaster as "the failures of this furtive, secretive, over-centralised and inefficient society".

The Prime Minister joined in to emphasise Britain's openness compared with the secretive approach of the Soviet Union. Yet the self-same obsession with secrecy has dominated Britain's nuclear industry.

I can describe that attitude no better than the Financial Times did yesterday when it said that have been the watchwords for the conduct of the nuclear industry in Britain. The reasons for that can only be, again as the Financial Times states, that the nuclear power industry is tied up with, and the by-product of, nuclear weapons.

"secrecy, suppression, denial, evasion, subterfuge . . . arrogance, and bland reassurance"

The Secretary of State for Energy has declared that he will introduce a policy of total openness. He is reported as saying:

"I desire to have no secrecy of any description, and the way to get public confidence is to make sure there is no secrecy."

He does not explain how this would be achieved other than by changing the highly technical language which the industry uses.

The undoubted links between civil and military nuclear power will make the right hon. Gentleman's task even more difficult. With Labour's policy of decommissioning Polaris and ending the Trident programme, the production of weapons grade material will be halted. The military need for secrecy will be vastly reduced and full public accountability can be achieved.

Meanwhile, will the Government take meaningful steps towards total openness by repealing the relevant provisions of the Official Secrets Act 1911? In the new spirit of international co-operation on civil nuclear power, perhaps the Secretary of State will tell the House whether he is prepared to grant full access to Euratom, the EEC's nuclear agency—access that has been under discussion since he was responsible for energy in a previous Tory Administration?

The Secretary of State has repeated several times that the accident at Chernobyl could not happen here. We know that the mechanics are different. The Magnox reactors share one design weakness which became evident at Chernobyl—there is no secondary containment to trap emissions in the event of an explosion rupturing the pressure vessel. Mr. Eddie Ryder, chief inspector of nuclear installations has said that the reactors

"probably would not be licensed today."

There are also similarities between the RMBK and the American PWR. Both depend upon a rapid and regular flow of water under high pressure to prevent overheating. An accident in a similar reactor led to the incident at Three Mile Island. In that incident, children and pregnant women within a five-mile radius were evacuated and thousands more left of their own accord. What is important is that the presidential commission that investigated the accident concluded that the fundamental cause was operator error. Nothing can be done to prevent human error, and nothing can compensate for it.

Since the inception of nuclear power, there has been a succession of worldwide accidents — none of them as dramatic or serious as Chernobyl. Senator John Glenn has quoted from a classified United States document that there have been 151 significant nuclear safety incidents in the past 15 years. My right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) referred to this.

That statement refutes the claim made by the right hon. Member for Guildford in an article in the Sunday Express on 4 May that, all around the globe, nuclear power stations are being run without harm or pollution. The Government are resting on their laurels when they say that the British nuclear industry's safety record is second to none.

The Secretary of State should have made a statement to Parliament regarding the recent incident at Dungeness. Why, in the new spirit of openness, was that not done? I do not wish to add to public anxiety or to scaremonger, but the people wish to know about this issue. The Government's complacency begs many questions the answers to which the House and the public are entitled to know. Most disturbing is the reported weakness of the nuclear installations inspectorate.

Last September, The Times reported that there were serious staff shortages at the nuclear installations inspectorate. At the end of 1985, The Times stated that more than 30 per cent. of the inspectorate staff would be nearing retirement age, but that a recruitment drive during the previous three years had produced only just more than a dozen members of staff and that it took at least two years to train inspectors. The chief inspector at the time said that the Sizewell inquiry had absorbed 25 per cent. of the inspectorate's time, leaving other work to be delayed or left undone.

The NII told the Advisory Committee on the Safety of Nuclear Installations that reviewing the safety of Britain's Magnox and AGR stations was straining staff and resources. It complained that it could not pay

"the desired amount of attention to industrial safety".

We are now told that none of the inspections of the Magnox stations is complete, and that there may be delays in the safety assessment of AGRs. The Secretary of State seems to find that funny, but the public are extremely concerned about the safety of the nuclear industry. They want to know why the inspectorate has been reduced and why there are insufficient people in that industry. The bland reassurances given by an Energy Minister in the House last year are not sufficient. The House must know what steps the Government are taking to ensure that the NII is adequately staffed to meet the inspectorate's great and increasing workload.

Ministers' attempts to convince Britain that all is well with nuclear power have failed, so what arguments are left? A major plank in the Government's attempt to sell nuclear power to the British people is that of cheaper electricity, yet the Department of Energy has admitted that modern coal-fired stations are cheaper to run than Magnox reactors. Recently, we have heard a lot from the Secretary of State about the benefits of cheap electricity to the French as a result of their nuclear programme, but the reality of the French electricity industry is somewhat different.

Many people have argued that the price France is offering the United Kingdom amounts to a loss leader in an attempt to achieve at least some return on nuclear plant that would otherwise stand idle. The French electricity industry has lost money for the past two years, and its debt has soared to 200 billion francs. That has been criticised as "excessive" by the French watchdog body, which went on to state that the industry had made its investments "in the most inappropriate manner".

[Mr. Stanley Orme]

Financial analysts have predicted that, because of that debt burden, the French electricity industry will be forced to increase its tariffs. So much for the long-term benefits of a massive nuclear power programme.

But even if the Secretary of State's belief that nuclear power will reduce electricity costs has some foundation, the British people now say that the benefit is not worth the risks involved. Yet the Government are not even prepared to pause and take stock of the nuclear power programme. Mr. Eddie Ryder, the chief nuclear inspector, forecast that there would be a period of reflection before further decisions were taken about the future of Britain's nuclear power programme. However, he has been proved wrong, because the Government have not taken a period of reflection. He apparently also forecast that the Government's emphasis would be on persuading the public that the risk of a serious accident was so remote that it was judged acceptable when set against the benefits of nuclear power. If that is the case, the public relations exercise is clearly not working.

The Government are so wholeheartedly committed to expanding their nuclear programme that other areas of research and development have become the poor relations. Nuclear research continues to expand, with over £300 million allocated annually from a variety of sources, compared with just £14 million for renewable, or benign, energy sources. As the Energy Committee stated in its report entitled, "Energy Research, Development and Demonstration in the United Kingdom":

"when the treatment of different aspects of energy R & D is so glaringly inconsistent, it is difficult to be satisfied that a sensible balance of priorities has been arrived at."

Renewables are an investment for the future. We accept that they will form only a percentage of supply, but even the CEGB admitted in evidence to the Sizewell B inquiry that it could accept a contribution of up to 20 per cent. from a mix of renewable resources without operational problems. That is far from a "marginal" contribution. By the end of the decade, the question of renewable sources will have become a serious issue. In consequence, we may find that that will be very important.

When the Gas Bill was in Committee, we attempted to induce the Government to oblige the British Gas Corporation to take responsibility for energy conservation. Once again, their commitment to the fifth fuel proved to be shabby as they totally rejected that possibility. Equally shabby is the Government's commitment to the coal industry. We have supplies of coal to last for hundreds of years; we have the technology to ensure that coal-fired power stations are environmentally acceptable; and we have the technology to turn coal into oil and gas. Despite that, the coal industry is being run down by the Government.

We must have an energy policy based on coal, using the most up-to-date technology. Work on pressurised fluidised bed combustion must be accelerated. There must be a major programme to install desulphurisaton processes in existing coal and oil-fired power stations which, while creating a large number of jobs, would also reduce acid rain emissions dramatically.

It is clear that the Government lack the will to develop new, safe and clean ways of providing Britain with sources of energy. They also lack any coherent approach to Britain's energy needs. We believe that the country's dependence on nuclear power must be reduced, and that our future lies predominantly with the use of coal as its major source of energy and as part of a planned national energy policy.

We would ensure that full reviews were carried out of the Magnox stations and that those that had reached the end of their useful design life were decommissioned and phased out. Nuclear power cannot be halted tomorrow, so we would have a planned reduction in Britain's dependence on nuclear power. Any replacement power station capacity will be provided by constructing new coal-fired power stations, using all the latest technology. The costs involved in this must be met in order to safeguard people's welfare and the environment. We remain totally opposed to the construction of all PWR power stations, at Sizewell or anywhere else in Britain. We will not consider the introduction of the fast reactor.

Following the Chernobyl disaster, which the world has shared, there should be no question but that the Government must pause in any expansion of the nuclear power programme. As a matter of urgency, the Government must ensure that any safety reviews of Magnox stations that have been completed are published, that those still outstanding are accelerated, and that the nuclear installations inspectorate is strengthened. They must halt the production of weapons-grade material, from whatever source.

The Government should accept the recommendation of the Select Committee on the Environment for an urgent economic re-appraisal of the THORP at Sellafield, but we recognise that Sellafield will be necessary when decommissioning takes place. The Government maintain that jobs will be lost if they do not go ahead with the PWR. Manufacturing industry disagrees. The Government have the facility to construct a 900 MW coal-fired station, with potential for export demand, which would ensure that jobs were safeguarded.

The Government must end the uncertainty and the speculation about the construction of the PWR. They should call in Sir Frank Layfield and Lord Marshall and tell them that the plans to build a PWR in Britain will not go ahead. That is what the Labour party stands for, and what we advocate tonight.

9.38 pm

The Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Peter Walker): I will want later to compare the speech of the right hon. Member for Salford, East (Mr. Orme) with the opening speech made by the Opposition Front Bench spokesman, the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), because there were considerable differences between the speeches.

In the debate there have been a whole range of differing views on both sides of the House. A number of my hon. Friends who represent constituencies where the storage of nuclear waste is being considered as a possibility understandably made vigorous and lively speeches suggesting various options to the system that is currently proposed.

It is interesting that the hon. Members for Copeland, for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) and for Tottenham (Mr. Atkinson) have constituencies or trade unions that are closely connected with the nuclear industry. With their knowledge and experience, all three were positive in their approach to the nuclear industry—as positive as were the last Labour Government.

In fairness to the last Labour Government, although we have been criticised by the Opposition Front Bench for our failure to go ahead with any form of nuclear reactor in the last seven years, which is a perfectly reasonable criticism, we cannot make the same criticism of the last Labour Government. It was that Labour Government who first embarked upon one particular form of reactor that they later decided to abandon. They then gave the order for two further AGR power stations now in the course of construction and moving towards completion. They opened the view that we should consider carefully the possibility of a PWR, and gave the go-ahead for the major investment programme of BNFL. I must confess, therefore, that in their contribution to the nuclear programme of the country the Labour Government of that era—with the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) playing a distinguished role in it — were very positive.

One must ask whether the Labour party now uses the argument: as we are self-sufficient in energy, why bother with nuclear energy? Why was it in that period, when we were fast moving towards self-sufficiency in energy, that the Labour Government decided objectively, reasonably and obviously after careful consideration that that was the right course to pursue?

In the debate, therefore, we have seen a recognition of the deep anxiety about the events that have taken place in the Soviet Union. As one future benefit of those events, it now appears likely that the Soviet Union will move to a greater sense of international collaboration on these matters than hitherto. I am not surprised at that. In the talks that I had in Moscow with the new personalities in the Government led by Mr. Gorbachev, those new personalities were very aware that their ambitious plans for the growth of the economy of the Soviet Union much depended upon a massive growth in the energy supplies that the Soviet Union was able to produce.

Unlike the United Kingdom, the Soviet Union has the benefits of massive coal resources and of oil and gas. It is a country that one can argue is self-sufficient in energy without nuclear energy. However, the Soviet Government have objectively decided that, in the massive expansion of energy production that they want between now and the end of the century, the fastest area of production required is in nuclear energy. The Soviet Government have done this for a variety of reasons, including what they consider is the best means of taking energy to the various parts of the Soviet Union and the general efficiency of that method. They were anxious to see the know-how of the West in terms of safety, and the disposal of nuclear waste is a matter on which they wish to collaborate and towards which they wish to work.

I am pleased to say that the Soviet Union has opened its information to the International Atomic Energy Agency after the initial clampdown. The leading figures in the agency have visited the site. They communicated with me today to tell me that the Soviet Union has agreed to give the fullest possible report on the accident and all the lessons to be learnt from it. A conference will be organised by the agency—it hopes that it will take place in June—during which the Soviet Union will present all the facts of which it is aware.

The right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) said that he has been in favour of the civil use of nuclear energy and considers that international collaboration is an important element, which is the view that was taken at the Tokyo summit. Eastern European countries were critical of the lack of immediate information that was available from the Soviet Union, and I hope that as a result of the incident we can substantially improve international collaboration.

Criticism has been expressed from the Opposition Front Bench about the manner in which information was provided during the potential and actual event of radiation in Britain. Anyone who considers objectively the way in which Ministers concerned with nuclear energy quickly took the monitoring action that was necessary and the publishing of that material will accept that the Government need make no apology for their action. It was right that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, with his specific responsibilities, led the Government team that was responsible for the monitoring. The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has knowledge and knowhow of identifying radiation levels on land and in the sea, and it started its operations as soon as we had knowledge of the accident. The Health and Safety Executive and the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate joined in to ensure that all necessary measures were taken.

Unlike other countries, responsibilities for inspection are with a range of Departments, and we should reflect on the wisdom of this approach. It is right that environmental protection should be with the Department of the Environment, which should have responsibility for ensuring that standards are maintained. Land, sea or food pollution is a matter for the Department which has the expertise and independence to deal with the problem administratively. It is right that the Health and Safety Executive, which has considerable independence, should lay down standards for safety factors.

Mr. Allan Roberts: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Walker: I shall not give way, because I agreed that the time allocated to the Front Bench replies should be reduced substantially. I think that in fairness the hon. Gentleman should allow me to continue.

It was suggested by the hon. Member for Copeland, when he opened the debate on behalf of the Opposition, that as soon as the report of the Select Committee on the Environment, under the chairmanship of my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi), was published, I issued a statement condemning it. That is untrue. I refused to make any comment on the report until the Government had prepared a proper reply.

Mr. Roberts rose——

Mr. Walker: My hon. Friend and I were involved together in work on environmental matters way back in the 1960s. I have immense respect and regard for his diligence and ability in these matters. He knows that shortly after receiving his report I had discussions with him about it and listened to the constructive case that is set out in the report.

Mr. Roberts rose——

Mr. Walker: My hon. Friend set out his views on compensation for those who bear the brunt of developments of the sort that we have been discussing this evening. My hon. Friend knows from his past ministerial experience that there are complications and difficulties. When one is dealing with straight compensation matters, one finds that, although something may be unfortunate, in its judgment, for the particular household concerned, it does not have a bearing on the valuation of the property.

[Mr. Walker]

If one considers the enormous development at Sellafield and the very large work force that is employed there—and likewise at Heathrow — the result has been an increase in property prices. NIREX has stated that it wants objectively to examine the contribution that it can make and I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and the Government will carefully consider any proposals that are made.

My hon. Friend also referred to the importance of adopting Rolls-Royce standards for the treatment of all forms of waste. I understand that point of view. My hon. Friend's report shows that he agrees that Rolls-Royce standards are very much a means of giving confidence to the public.

I had discussions with British Nuclear Fuels plc last week and I understand that it considers that there are ways in which it can improve considerably its performance.

Mr. Allan Roberts: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Walker: Can I say—[HON. MEMBERS: "No. Give way."] It is important that the international energy scene should be put into context. My hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) referred to the international energy scene. What has been absent from this debate——

Mr. Roberts: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Minister refuses to give way. He is misleading the House and——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a matter for me.

Mr. Roberts: It is a matter for you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Walker: One of the factors that has been left out of this debate is a consideration of the international position.

Mr. Roberts rose——

Mr. Walker: Can I say—[HON. MEMBERS: "No. Give way."] That element has been absent from this Debate. Naturally we have considered the immediate effects of the incident in the Soviet Union and its impact upon public opinion. But can I say—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Anybody who studies future essential needs knows that of all forms of energy known to man, that which is most likely to be an absolute necessity in the 21st century is nuclear energy, provided that it can be safely produced and safely presented. Can I just say—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."] It is estimated that by the year 2025 the world's population will have increased from 4·7 billion to 8 billion. On any estimate of nuclear and other forms of energy requirements, if we look at available fossil fuels it appears that, if we are to keep energy supplies at today's levels, by the year 2025, taking into account all the conservation measures that can be adopted, a ninefold increase in nuclear energy worldwide will be needed.

We have to contrast the two speeches that were made from the Opposition Front Bench. The hon. Member for Copeland said that it is essential to keep available the nuclear option. However, the right hon. Member for Salford, East said that this is the time to phase out the nuclear industry in this country. The Labour party must make it clear to the country whether or not it wishes to abolish the nuclear industry in this country. If it does, I hope that the right hon. Member for Salford, East will call together the shop stewards of the nuclear industry that he brought to my Department a few months ago to complain about the lack of expansion of the nuclear industry. I hope that he will say that now that there has been an incident in the Soviet Union, he has decided to phase out 100,000 jobs in the British nuclear industry. That is the policy that the right hon. Gentleman is pursuing, in sharp contrast with those who have a deep knowledge of the nuclear industry, such as the hon. Members for Copeland and for Tottenham.

The hon. Member for Tottenham raised an important aspect about Sizewell, PWRs and fast breeder reactors —it was the quality of engineering. As we all know, his union has made a great contribution to the nuclear industry, and considers that it is an industry of the future. The engineering industry believes that if we follow the suggestion of the Labour party that no decisions are made about the nuclear industry in the foreseeable future, as anyone connected with the industry knows, its existence in this country will disappear.

The Government have correctly decided to take great care before making any decisions on a nuclear reactor. The argument that the Government have been aggressively pro-nuclear is demolished by the manner in which we set up the Sizewell inquiry. It is remarkable that with an inquiry of that quality and duration, the Opposition have decided to ignore its findings even before they are published.

It is important to recognise that, of course, the Government would like the nuclear industry to succeed. We believe that of all the forms of energy known to man, nuclear energy is likely to be the front runner in the next century. However, it can be that only if it proves to be safe and if the engineering standards applied to it are of the highest quality. It is only on that basis that any democratic Government can pursue nuclear energy. This Government, more than any post-war Government, have taken the most enormous care to give every consideration to the quality of decision taking. Therefore, we await the Sizewell inquiry report, which is expected in September. We will study what comes before the International Atomic Energy Agency as a result of what has happened in the Soviet Union. We will then carefully discuss and debate the potentiality of nuclear energy in the years to come.

I believe and hope that we can secure standards of safety and environmental quality that will make that form of energy available to mankind. I hasten to add that if we fail in that task, we must not underestimate the damage that will be done to living standards throughout the world as the fossil sources of energy decline and there is no alternative form of energy. The hon. Member for Workington was correct to recognise that, in reality, it is the developing Third world countries, with the improving living standards of people now devoid of energy, that are dependent upon the success of nuclear energy.

Trying to achieve that success, in standards of environmental quality, total safety and good engineering skills, is the objective of the Government. One of my hon. Friends pleaded that one cannot pursue support for nuclear energy, if, at that time, public opinion is not with one. That is the basis of democracy, and Governments can be defeated if public opinion is not behind them. If any Government failed to put forward the public's basic need for nuclear energy, they would be guilty of a wrongful act towards the future of western civilisation.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the steps taken by the Government to keep the House and the public informed of the consequences for the United Kingdom of the accident at the nuclear plant at Chernobyl in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; endorses the Government's commitment to the safety of the complete nuclear fuel cycle in the United Kingdom; and in that context approves the Government's first stage response on 2nd May to the Environment Committee's report on radioactive waste (House of Commons Paper No. 191), setting out as it does the principles against which current proposals to dispose of low-level radioactive waste can be considered.

Hong Kong

10.29 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): I beg to move,

That the draft Hong Kong (British Nationality) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 7th May, be approved.

The draft nationality order carries out arrangements which have been fully considered and debated over many months and it represents the culmination of a long period of careful work. It stems from the joint declaration with the Chinese Government, which, with the wholehearted approval of the House, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister signed in December 1984. It continued with the Hong Kong Act 1985, which again the House fully debated and approved. It led from there to our debate in January, when there was a full opportunity to consider the detailed arrangements which are now incorporated in the draft order. Equally full and detailed discussions have been held in Hong Kong.

It is right that the matter should have been dealt with in this careful way, because fair and comprehensive nationality arrangements are vital to the future of people in Hong Kong and to the successful carrying out of the agreement with the Chinese.

I shall not describe in detail the provisions of the order, because they are in the form that the House considered in January, apart from one or two drafting and minor technical amendments. It establishes those who, because of their connection with Hong Kong, will cease to be British dependent territories citizens in 1997, and it gives them the right to acquire British national (overseas) status —BN(O)—and the passport that goes with it. The order makes provisions also to guard against statelessness.

Our proposals in the order are fully consistent with our obligations under the joint declaration and properly exercise our powers under the Hong Kong Act. I think that this has been generally accepted in earlier debates in the House, as it has been in Hong Kong. Following their debate last December, however, the Hong Kong Legislative and Executive Councils made three points which have attracted support in the House and in another place. They were, first, that there should be an endorsement in British national (overseas) passports to show that the holder did not require a visa or entry certificate to visit the United Kingdom; secondly, that former service men in Hong Kong who fought in its interests during the second world war should be granted British citizenship; and, thirdly, that British dependent territories citizens in Hong Kong who were not ethnically Chinese, and who had not exercised their right to be British nationals (overseas), and who had no other form of nationality, should be granted British citizenship in 1997 rather than British overseas citizenship.

The Government agreed to consider each of those points fully. We have done so with great care over many months, listening to the many representations made. As a result, as the House will know from my announcement on 23 April, we have met two of the three requests.

First, for the British national overseas passport, we will place in each an endorsement which will read:

"In accordance with the United Kingdom immigration rules the holder of this passport does not require an entry certificate or visa to visit the United Kingdom."

An explanatory leaflet will be given to each passport holder, which will make it clear that we welcome visitors from Hong Kong and which will set out the holder's position under the present immigration rules. I am glad that this concession has been welcomed by the Unofficial Members of the Executive and Legislative Councils.

Secondly, we have also agreed to meet the concern for ex-service men. There are about 270, and of those, 60 or so are eligible to apply for registration as British citizens under section 4(5) of the British Nationality Act 1981. I am ready to consider sympathetically any applications from these ex-service men. To meet the needs of the others, I have agreed also that any of the 270 may be accepted here for settlement, together with their dependants. The Unofficial Members of the Legislative and Executive Councils have also welcomed these arrangements.

We considered long and hard the third request—that British citizenship should be granted to British dependent territories citizens who were not ethnically Chinese and who might risk statelessness after 1997. We accept fully our commitments to this community, and we intend to honour them in full, but we must also consider the implications of going as far as they have asked. We believe that such a step is not necessary to provide them with the proper measure of security they need, and that it would carry considerable implications in the years ahead which we could not responsibly ignore.

We have approached the problem with two firm principles in mind. The first is that no British dependent territories citizen should have any reason to fear becoming stateless in 1997; nor after 1997 should their children, or their grandchildren. The provision of British overseas citizenship for any who would otherwise be stateless because they have not taken up their right to be a British national (overseas), and the assurances of British overseas citizenship for the children and grandchildren of British dependent territories citizens, fully meet these commitments.

Our second principle is that we should ensure that people settled in Hong Kong can continue to have the right to live there. No form of British nationality can guarantee this after 1997. It has been secured, however, through the agreement with the Chinese. That guarantees rights of abode in Hong Kong for all non-ethnic Chinese who have made it their permanent home. The agreement is binding in international law and, to make it binding in local law, the provisions are to be written into a basic law governing the Hong Kong special administrative region.

Our proposals fully meet our commitments to provide all British dependent territories citizens in Hong Kong with the right to a home, with a clear form of nationality and with assurances for their children and grandchildren.

To go further and grant British citizenship in the way suggested, would take the problem out of the immediate context of Hong Kong and risk setting up pressures and uncertainties which could only have damaging and undesirable consequences elsewhere. We must remember that there are about two million British overseas citizens in various parts of the world, of whom about 800,000 have that as their only form of citizenship. We must think of the message which they might receive, and the doubts and uncertainties which would be raised, if we were to accept that British overseas citizenship was not adequate for some people in Hong Kong.

[Mr. Douglas Hurd]

We must also take into account the sensible principle of the British Nationality Act, which the House approved in 1981, that British citizenship should reflect a person's close personal links with the United Kingdom. And, as British citizenship carries with it the right to come and settle in this country, we must think of our commitment to a fair and firm immigration policy. There are at present about 11,500 people in Hong Kong who in 1997 might seek to benefit under the statelessness provisions, and we do not know what might have affected the size of the commitment by then.

There are those who argue that, given the circumstances of Hong Kong, it would be prudent to grant these people British citizenship in case circumstances there were to change and they had to leave. If this were to be the case there would no doubt need to be a good deal of reconsideration and readjustment, but it is not sensible to go into the next 11 years planning for the worst, and we have no reason to do so.

I understand the concerns of this community, and that is why we have made it clear that if any British nationals were at any time to come under pressure to leave Hong Kong, we would expect the Government of the day to consider sympathetically their admission to the United Kingdom on a cases by case basis. Mr. John Swaine, the convenor of the Legislative Council's ad hoc group on the order, has been quoted as welcoming this as a strong moral commitment to this community. I am sure that he was right to do so.

Sir Russell Johnston (Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber): Is the essence of the Minister's comments that he has rejected the third category of argument, even though it applies to a relatively small number of people, because of the relevance of the other, up to 2 million, elsewhere in the world?

Mr. Hurd: That is part of the argument. Of the 2 million, 800,000 have no other form of citizenship. If we were to take action which would devalue British overseas citizenship, it would have serious effects on them. That was one of the arguments. I have gone on to deploy another connected with immigration. I have gone beyond the point on which the hon. Gentleman was fastening to explain the case by case approach which any Government would have to adopt if the need arose. I was quoting the welcome for this undertaking which has been given by Mr. Swaine in Hong Kong.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): Notwithstanding any commitment that might be made for the future, will the Minister recognise that the result of Government policy will be to give 10,000 people in Hong Kong a right of abode in Hong Kong without citizenship, or citizenship in the United Kingdom without right of abode? If the very least of the right hon. Gentleman's constituents came to see him at his surgery to complain about it, would he not do all in his power to fight against such a monstrous injustice? Why, therefore, is he condemning no fewer than 10,000 citizens in Hong Kong to such inadequacy in the future?

Mr. Hurd: I would fight against any injustice, but I would try to establish the facts in my own mind before doing so. Through the connection between the agreement with China and the contents of the order, we are providing a right of abode and British overseas citizenship to those who do not take out the BN(O) passport. For the reasons that I have given, if the hon. Gentleman had been listening, I believe that that provides the best assurance for a secure and confident future for the people of Hong Kong, including the 11,500 about whom the hon. Gentleman is particularly concerned. He does neither them nor Hong Kong any service by misinterpreting a matter which has been so carefully and strongly discussed and debated in the colony, where there is a growing understanding that the arrangement we have made is sensible.

There are already signs of continuing encouragement about the future of Hong Kong. The Joint Liaison Group continues to work well. It has made arrangements to ensure that after 1997 Hong Kong keeps its place in the world trading community, and it has also formally agreed the terms of the right of abode endorsement which I have just mentioned in the BN(O) passport.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): In writing to the Hong Kong Indian Association on 30 April, the Home Secretary said that the Government would have further discussions with the Government of China. Are the discussions which have already taken place the limit of such discussions, or does he expect to have further discussions?

Mr. Hurd: The discussions which have already taken place have led to the position which I am putting to the House. Nothing that I am saying now will contradict or come as a surprise to the Chinese Government. I have reported to the House on the link between the agreement and the discussions with the People's Republic of China and the order before the House.

Many of us have from our own experiences deep admiration and respect for Hong Kong. The Government have made a significant contribution to establishing and building up that confidence by carefully measured steps, not all easy to arrive at, but many of which have been considered and approved by the House. The nationality order represents another important step along the way. The arrangements that we have made for the ethnic minorities, as for all other British dependent territories citizens in Hong Kong, fully honour our commitments. They offer a sound and responsible basis for continued confidence and security in the future.

I believe that the order, as part of the series of measured steps, will serve the people of Hong Kong well. I commend it to the House.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): This is the second occasion in recent months on which the House has debated the citizenship of Hong Kong consequent upon the transfer of that territory to China in 1997. May I repeat what many hon. Members and I said during our debate in January —that nothing that we say tonight should undermine our confidence in the future of Hong Kong after 1997, when it becomes part of China. Confidence is a delicate matter, and we owe it to the people of Hong Kong to encourage a state of confidence and optimism about the future. Those are not merely words; having visited Hong Kong last year, I believe that there are good chances of a successful and prosperous future for the people of Hong Kong after 1997.

We are debating the citizenship and status of those who are not ethnic Chinese and, therefore, not automatically

Chinese citizens and will not automatically have the ability to become Chinese citizens after 1997. It must be said that, after 1997, Hong Kong will be unique. I can think of no territory in the history of the British empire—or at the end of the British empire—that has been transferred to another country as Hong Kong will be transferred in about 11 years' time. That is why this is an especially difficult problem of citizenship which would not apply if Hong Kong became a completely independent territory, as so many parts of the British Commonwealth have become in the past 30 years.

As the Home Secretary said, in recent months, the Government have been pressed on three issues. He mentioned the endorsement in the passport. Of course, that is welcome for what it is worth, but we must be honest with ourselves and with the people of Hong Kong and say that that endorsement is simply a reiteration of the present position. It adds not one jot to the rights of the people of Hong Kong; it simply puts into their passports rights that they should have anyway. The people of Hong Kong have told us about their difficulties when they arrive at British airports as tourists or on business. The hassles to which they are subjected have given rise to the feeling that their passports should contain something to protect them.

There may be a change of heart at Heathrow airport, and the endorsement may give them protection, but the Home Secretary knows that the Hong Kong Government advise their citizens visiting Britain to obtain entry clearance certificates first to save themselves difficulties at the point of entry. I hope that the endorsement will have the effect that the Home Secretary claims, but let us be honest and admit to ourselves that it simply reiterates the present position.

The concession granted to former prisoners of war is welcome. We argued their case in the previous debate, and we are glad that the Government have acceded to our requests.

The ethnic minorities are unhappy about the Government's proposals, the more so as the Government revealed those proposals in answer to a parliamentary question a couple of weeks ago. The Home Secretary will be aware that the Council of Hong Kong Indian Organisations has lobbied hard and effectively to express its anxiety about the position of its members after 1997. The Home Secretary will be aware that the Legislative Council in Hong Kong made strong and clear recommendations.

There have been other representations. I received a telegram from Sir Roger Lobo, an eminent man of Portuguese origin in Hong Kong, from which I quote:

"The British Government's failure to consider minorities' case was bitterly disappointing to those non-ethnic Chinese Hong Kong citizens and this includes people of European ancestry who have lived here for generations. They feel betrayed."

He mentions the position of Portuguese people there and comments on Britain and Portugal celebrating the 600th anniversary of the treaty of Windsor, which was signed on 9 May 1386. He feels that the Government proposals leave most of the ethnic minorities in Hong Kong with an uncertain future there. That is a powerful telegram. I am sure that the Home Secretary has received the same message sent directly to him at the Home Office.

We are talking about the nature of British responsibility for these people in Hong Kong. The Home Secretary has said that they will have a right of abode there as decided by the agreement with the Government of China. But, of course, giving them British overseas citizenship status in Hong Kong, albeit with the right of abode which is the subject of an international agreement, does not give those people in Hong Kong from the ethnic minorities equal and full citizenship with other people in Hong Kong. The Home Secretary knows, as we know, that British overseas citizenship is not citizenship in any true sense of the word. It is a term devised in the British Nationality Act 1981 to get us out of one of the embarrassing legacies of empire. It has now been applied with a difference to the situation in Hong Kong, the difference being that it will be able to be passed on for a couple of generations. The Home Secretary said that he had no wish to devalue British overseas citizenship. For the life of me, I cannot understand how something that has so little value can be devalued any further.

If I may turn to a particular point of substance and one to which the Home Secretary referred, in reply to a written question and, indeed, again today, the Home Secretary said:

"If, however, any British national were in the future to come under pressure to leave Hong Kong, we would expect the Government of the day to consider sympathetically the case for admission to the United Kingdom."—[Official Report, 23 April 1986; Vol. 96, c. 148.]

It is not being suggested that there would be obvious pressure for these people to leave Hong Kong. Surely the problem is rather this. Because they will not be full and equal citizens after 1997 with the majority of the people of Hong Kong, their position will be difficult. It may well become untenable while they are in Hong Kong.

If the Home Secretary used his words carefully, as we must assume that he did, he was giving only a very slight concession to people under pressure to leave, not people who find that, because of their unequal citizenship status, they are having an unhappy and miserable time in Hong Kong. I hope, like everybody, that it will not come to that. However, if it does, those people surely are entitled to greater safeguards.

Because there are fears to that effect, the ethnic minorities in Hong Kong have been arguing that they should be given some sort of assurance before 1997, not after that date. I do not know whether the Home Secretary has received a copy of the editorial of the South China Morning Post of Monday 12 May. Referring to the ethnic minorities of Hong Hong, it says:

"As has been repeatedly stated, there is little interest in leaving at present. The minorities are on the whole contented with life in Hong Kong, regard this as their home, are mostly well entrenched in business or the civil service or are long-term employees with their roots here. Their only desire is to have the right at some future date to emigrate if conditions in Hong Kong make it impossible to stay. That, coupled with the right to enter as visitors to the UK without visas, would be an acceptable compromise for the majority, if the British Government is unwilling or unable to take all."

That is only the view of one newspaper, albeit the leading English language newspaper in Hong Kong, but it suggests that at the least the Government could have gone a bit further.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I agree with my hon. Friend in the case that he has made about the unsatisfactory nature of the order. In view of the fact that the Government are now a lame duck Government fast approaching the end of their term of office,—only a couple of Conservative Members are making gesticulations, and other Conservative Members are being very quiet about this—will my hon. Friend in the next Labour Government reconsider the order in the light of the changing circumstances and the situation at that time?

Mr. Dubs: My hon. Friend has anticipated precisely what I was about to say. It is right that I should state what the next Labour Government's policy will be — [Interruption.] Conservative Members may laugh, but the policies of the next Labour Government will be with us pretty soon. I am sure that Conservative Members are aware of that. The Opposition have a commitment to repeal the Immigration Act and the Nationality Act and to replace those measures with non-discriminatory legislation. This will involve inevitably a wide-ranging review of immigration and nationality policy. As part of that review, we shall take into account the requests and claims of various groups, including those of the ethnic minorities in Hong Kong. We shall take those into account as the basis of a just and non-discriminatory immigration and nationality policy.

The critical date for the people of Hong Kong is 1 July 1997, and there will be a Labour Government in Britain many years before then. We shall be starting——

Mr. Hal Miller (Bromsgrove): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dubs: I shall not give way. Other hon. Members wish to speak and I do not want to tresspass on their time.

We shall be starting the process of reviewing immigration and nationality policy in about two years' time, when we shall be sitting on the Government Benches.

It would not have taken much for the Government this evening to show a little awareness of the real concerns of the ethnic minorities in Hong Kong. I do not think that the Home Secretary showed any real concern. He said that he had thought about the matter and had decided that the answer would be no. Some of the assurances that he tried to give the ethnic minorities in Hong Kong sounded singularly unconvincing. Indeed, it sounded as if the right hon. Gentleman was not convinced of what he was saying.

The ethnic minorities have the right to say that the Government have turned a deaf ear to their plea, and that is not good enough. For that reason, we shall be voting against the order.

Sir Peter Blaker (Blackpool, South): My family connection with Hong Kong goes back 75 years, and in the previous Parliament, for a couple of years, I was the Minister concerned with Hong Kong at the time when the negotiations which led to the successful agreement that was initialed in 1984 were in their early stages. I take a great interest, therefore, in the success of Hong Kong and in the welfare and preservation of the way of life of all its people of whatever race. I want to congratulate my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on the decision that he has taken and on the terms of the order.

I pressed my hon. Friend the Minister of State on the endorsing of passports and on the matter of prisoners of war when we debated the draft order dealing with these issues, and I want especially to express my gratitude for the steps that have been taken on those two points. They have not been easy matters. I know that the drafting of the wording to go into the passport was not easy but, I believe that the Government have come to the right solution.

Another matter which caused anxiety some time ago was whether the BNO passport would be acceptable at all to various countries. We no longer hear about that. I quote it as an example of something which caused considerable concern in Hong Kong but which has now been shown to have had no substance. Those who live in the intense, active and intelligent society of Hong Kong sometimes get themselves into a state of unnecessary anxiety.

The most difficult question relates to the ethnic minorities. The Council of Hongkong Indian Associations will, I know, be very disappointed by the decision. As has already been mentioned, it has lobbied effectively. I want to make four points about this matter.

First, it is not correct to allege, as the Council of Hongkong Indian Associations has alleged, that the Government have broken their promises. It is perfectly clear from what was said in the previous debate that no promises have been broken. I speak with some feeling, because after the debate a few months ago on the draft order I was accused of having broken a promise. That statement was entirely without foundation. I believe it does not help the case of the Council of Hongkong Indian Associations if it makes reckless accusations of that kind.

Secondly, I wish to refer to the numbers involved. The Council of Hongkong Indian Associations referred to 10,000. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department referred to 11,500. But is this the full picture? There must be people who do not hold BDTC passports but who are entitled to apply for BDTC passports. Moreover, will not the children of the 11,500 be entitled to BDTC passports before 1997? They will swell the number to well over 11,500. It is unrealistic to refer to 11,500 or 10,000. I hope that my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State who is to reply to the debate will say something about that question. Thirdly, I welcome the language used by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary in his answer to a parliamentary question on 23 April. In particular I welcome his statement that

"we have concluded that the granting of British citizenship is not justified in the present circumstances."—[Official Report, 23 April, 1986; Vol. 96, c. 147.]

I emphasise the words "in the present circumstances."

That answer appears to me to keep the door a bit open. I welcome also the words that have already been quoted about the possibility that British nationals might come under pressure to leave Hong Kong. They show that the Government's mind is not closed. It is right to remind the people of Hong Kong that there are still 11 years to go before 1997. If circumstances change drastically during that time—I do not believe that they will—this matter can be looked at again. I want to emphasise to my friends in Hong Kong that the language used by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary in his parliamentary answer is, in the British parliamentary context, very important and significant. They are not empty promises. They will be regarded as very important, if ever they should become relevant.

Fourthly, we should try to be clear about why the minorities in Hong Kong are worried. They are not worried about the agreement. They think it is a good agreement—as, I believe, everybody does. It guarantees to the people of Hong Kong all the freedom that they could possibly wish. It gives to them the right of abode. If we ask ourselves whether or not this agreement is being well implemented, the answer is that it is being implemented step by step with the Government of China. Agreement has been reached in the Land Commission about land. Agreement has also been reached about Hong Kong's position in the Asian Development bank. A very important agreement was reached recently that Hong Kong will be an independent member of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. That agreement was reached between China, the United Kingdom and GATT. It is more important than some of the other matters that have been causing concern in recent weeks to the people of Hong Kong.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): The right hon. Gentleman has referred to the fears of the Asian community in Hong Kong. He had long experience as Minister of State with responsibility for Hong Kong. What does he consider to be the true position of Peking if the British Government give British citizenship to these people? Does he really believe that after 1 July 1997 China will give Chinese citizenship to them?

Sir Peter Blaker: Peking has made it clear that it regards that question as a matter for the British Government, which is exactly what I expected it to say. The hon. Gentleman's latter question has already been answered—it is open to Hong Kong people to apply for citizenship of the People's Republic of China, and that sort of position applies in many countries throughout the world.

I was dealing with the question of what was causing anxiety to the Indian community in Hong Kong. Why does it want us to take action now, on the assumption that the agreement will not work? I believe that the Indians are worried not that they are likely to be expelled from Hong Kong after 1997 but that they may be discriminated against. We must recognise that relations between China and India, and between the Chinese and the Indians, have not always been free from friction. However, I believe that after 1997 there will be a rather special position in Hong Kong. There will be not a free enterprise territory run by Communists, but a free enterprise territory run by the people of Hong Kong. That is the whole point of the agreement. I think that the people of Hong Kong will recognise the mutual inter-dependence of all elements of Hong Kong society.

The Indians are inclined to say, and I am sure that they are right, that they control 20 per cent. of Hong Kong's foreign trade. Will the Chinese people of Hong Kong, after 1997, want to destroy or render less effective a community that is so important in the running of Hong Kong's economy? Surely it is clear to us now that China has understood the importance of confidence in a free enterprise economy and also, at least in part, the way in which a free enterprise economy works.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): The right hon. Gentleman is trying to explain away the concern of some of the Indian community. Will he not, in the way in which he usually attacks these matters, be absolutely frank and admit that, regardless of the present contribution of the Indian community to the welfare of Hong Kong, there is a past history that worries many Indians? They were the upholders of law and order under the British Government. In terms of the Pathan riot squad and acting frequently as prison warders and night watchmen, they were the maintainers of law and order. They will not necessarily be popular in the future social order of Hong Kong.

Sir Peter Blaker: I do not accept that premise. If Hong Kong is to run itself—which I believe will be the case, and which is the whole basis of the agreement on which everyone has been congratulating both Britain and China —the hon. Gentleman's point is not valid.

I want to cite an example that shows that Chinese and Indians can co-operate. I am surprised that it has not yet been cited. It is the example of Singapore. I believe that the Foreign Minister of Singapore is an Indian—Mr. Dhanabalan; he certainly was when I was a Minister. The Deputy Prime Minister of Singapore, which is predominately Chinese, is or recently was an Indian. There are other Indian Ministers and also prominent Indians in every walk of life. There is co-operation and equal rights between Chinese and Indians in Singapore, though it is a Chinese-dominated society in terms of numbers. I do not see why the Indians should be so pessimistic about the possibility of Hong Kong operating on a similar basis.

I say again what I said in the previous debate—that I believe that the agreement will be observed because it is in the interests of China as well as the people of Hong Kong that it should be observed. However, I take comfort from the fact that if things do go wrong, the Government —as I understand it—have kept the door ajar.

11.9 pm

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): It has already been noted that the House had an earlier and more lengthy opportunity of considering substantially this order on 16 January. However, on 16 January it so happened, for reasons which are not directly connected with the future of Hong Kong, that I was not a Member of the House. Therefore, I take the opportunity as briefly as possible afforded by tonight's debate of placing on record my anxieties about the future consequences of the changes which the order will make in the nationality law of the United Kingdom.

Those changes are two. The first is that we are extending British nationality at present to 3·25 million Hong Kong Chinese. It is British nationality because we repeatedly call it British nationality; and, because they are to be designated British nationals, their passports are to be issued in the name of Her Britannic Majesty's Secretary of State, and are to be renewed or issued as necessary by the consular posts of the United Kingdom. In every natural respect those who obtain that status will be regarded as British nationals.

The world knows what it thinks a British national is. It thinks a British national is a person who has the same rights in relation to the United Kingdom as a national of any other country normally has in relation to that other country, notably the right of entry and abode. That right does not inhere in that status. Therefore, the question arises, what is to be the future, in the event of there being a strong desire on the part of the holders of that status not to remain in Hong Kong, and if they were to look to the United Kingdom, of which we are making them nationals, as the natural place of abode or of residence?

It is not necessary in order to consider that prospect seriously to cast any doubt on the bona fides or to deny any of the hopes attached to the People's Republic of China, although our memories do not have to be long to survey a different scene in that People's Republic of China. It is simply necessary that our people have understood that the calling in of the implication of the conferment of our nationality on 3·25 million Chinese is not something which rests in the power of discretion of the United Kingdom. It depends on the behaviour of others and on circumstances over which, by definition, we shall have no control.

If those circumstances were so to develop that the implications of British nationality were to be sought, we should come under intolerable pressure in the world at large and within the United Kingdom community to acknowledge the reality of nationality, and that that reality cannot be devoid of a right of entry and of abode. Therefore, I believe that we are creating a potential commitment in what we are doing which we have no right to create and which I do not believe is fully understood by those outside.

It is not absolutely clear why we have thought it necessary to do so, or why we have had the concurrence —no more was needed—of the Chinese Government in doing so. It is not clear why a people so sensitive and proud as the Chinese should have been so ready to concur in our nationality being conferred on 3·25 million Hong Kong Chinese. It is not absolutely clear why, since a travel document and a passport of Hong Kong is to be available for ethnic Chinese after 1997, the availability of that document as a travel document should be regarded as so singularly important. I fear that it is regarded as an insurance that can be claimed in due course upon the strength of the implications of what we are doing in extending in this way our nationality.

That is the largest of the two changes that we are making, and potentially the most dangerous. The second has already been referred to quite extensively, and I shall therefore refer to it only briefly. It is that those who would otherwise be stateless are, by virtue of this order, to be able to obtain the status of British overseas citizenship. It is not clear, if they are stateless without it, what state they have with it.

Much has been said about the passports that will be available to the British nationals (overseas), but little has been said about the passports of the British overseas citizens, although I presume that they, too, if they are issued at all, will be issued in the name of Her Britanic Majesty's Secretary of State. There again, we are proporting to give a status to which there does not attach the most valuable quality and characteristics that national status and the possession of a nationality gives throughout the world. In doing this, we are incurring the danger of misunderstanding, and of being accused of double dealing in offering something and, upon it being claimed, its reality being found to be virtually non-existent.

We are in this position, as those of us who lived through the debates on the British Nationality Act 1981 are aware, as a result of the transformation of our nationality from one that rested upon allegience, before 1948, to one that now has a quite different basis, and which we have endeavoured, in line with other countries, to equate with connection with this United Kingdom, of which it is the nationality and the citizenship. We have been left with loose ends, and I fear that the manner in which this matter proceeds in regard to British nationality has left two loose ends—one large and pregnant with major danger, and the other, although minor in its scope, still pregnant with understanding and disgrace.

Sir Fergus Montgomery (Altrincham and Sale): I feel that I must criticise the Government because we should have had this debate yesterday, and it should have gone on for a much longer period than the time allotted to it tonight. Whoever in the Government is responsible for this change should be thoroughly ashamed of himself for compressing this debate into one and a half hours, which is not being fair to hon. Members.

I remind my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary of the promise that was made by my noble Friend Baroness Young on 19 February 1985, when she promised that the order would be withdrawn and revised to take account of the views expressed. In the debates that took place in this House and in the other place, many expressed grave doubts. I draw the attention of my right hon. Friend to what has gone on in the Hong Kong Legislative Council, which overwhelmingly asked for safeguards for the ethnic minorities in Hong Kong. They are not ethnically Chinese, and are not entitled to Chinese citizenship. Their only national status is that of British nationals overseas, and as far as I am aware that gives them no right to live anywhere, and cannot be passed on to their children.

I am speaking particularly on behalf of the 6,000 people who make up the Indian community, because most of them come from families which settled in Hong Kong many years ago and regard Hong Kong as their natural home. In 1947 they opted to stay in Hong Kong rather than accept Indian citizenship, and one of the problems about that is that India does not offer dual citizenship.

These people opted for Hong Kong because they believed in Hong Kong, and that is where they want to stay for ever. The community has always supported Britain, and has always been on our side. There is great anger in Hong Kong about the Government's behaviour.

This week I received a letter from a lady which stated:

"We are spending four months in Hong Kong where my husband is visiting Royal Society professor at the university here. (Our home is in Hale, Altrincham.)"

She is lucky — she has a very good Member of Parliament. Her letter continued:

"Having talked with many people here in Hong Kong, Chinese and expatriate alike, we have been saddened by reports of the Government's attitude towards the ethnic minorities, particularly the Indians, and very aware of the deep concern here for these people."

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary seems to believe certain things. First, he seems to believe that minorities will have the right to live in Hong Kong as a matter of law. In fact, I have been told that the right to live in Hong Kong will be subject to the powers of another nation—in this case, China, of which these people are not nationals.

Secondly, my right hon. Friend seems to feel that if we accede to the claims of that small number of people the position of other British overseas citizens will be affected. I remind my right hon. Friend that in the case of Gibraltar and the Falklands we have done something for the people who live there.

Thirdly, my right hon. Friend argues that to accede to the requests of these people would wrongly imply doubt about the commitment of the Sino-British joint declaration. The fact is that the Chinese Government believe that providing the Indian minority with an effective form of nationality is a matter for this Government and not for the Chinese Government.

Fourthly, my right hon. Friend seems to say blithely that if, in 1997, there is pressure for these people to leave Hong Kong, the Government of the day in Britain will consider sympathetically whether to admit them to the United Kingdom on a case-by-case basis. I am afraid that that has not assured the Hong Kong people or the Legislative Council. I believe that some of my right hon. Friend's statements are erroneous. People in Hong Kong to whom I have talked do not share my right hon. Friend's equanimity on this issue. They think that it is less than satisfactory to be given a vague non-binding assurance rather than a legal entitlement, which would at least put their minds at rest. They do not want to be the boat people of 1997. They want effective citizenship which guarantees them the right of abode somewhere.

Of course, numbers are important, and I have always agreed with the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) on this point. Over the years we have made a total mess of immigration. It is not a matter of the total population of Hong Kong wanting to descend on this country. My right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker) pointed out the difficulties if large numbers of people want to settle here. I suggest to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary—I hope that my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State will give some thought to this also—that we have a cut-off date, for example, in 1990, by which time all non-Chinese BDTCs should be required to register, and those non-Chinese BDTCs who have no other nationality available should qualify for full British citizenship. The time to do that is now, not in 1997. A three-year cut-off period would at least give the authorities time to examine each application.

I believe that there is something called justice and that the people who have given great loyalty to Britain over the years are entitled to some consideration. They do not want to descend on this country. They want to stay in Hong Kong, because it is there that they have their families, homes and businesses. All I ask is that they should have some security and not be left as stateless persons. I hope that my hon. and learned Friend the Minister can give some assurance. If he cannot give any assurance, I am afraid that I shall not vote in the Lobby with my hon. Friends.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): The Government have wisely yielded on the two issues on which they should never have demurred for such a long series of debates. A sinner's repentance—to a Presbyterian, that is particularly attractive—is always a plus and a bonus. The Government have many pluses and bonuses to earn in the hereafter.

We are pleased that the argument for the passport endorsement making it clear that Hong Kong British people do not need visas to visit Britain has at long last been accepted. It is only right also that ex-service men who have done their duty by this country will be granted full British citizenship or the right to settle in Britain. The protracted arguments in debate after debate which have been required to achieve these minor corrections should never have been necessary. That sad fact shows how mean minded the Government of the present Prime Minister are.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House know that there are many other examples of that meanness of spirit in many fields of policy. One of them, in this very matter of retreat from empire, is the continued refusal of the Government to accept their responsibilities — our responsibilities, British responsibilities—for the 11,000 or so British nationals in Hong Kong who are not ethnically Chinese and who, unlike those of Chinese origin, are not entitled to Chinese citizenship. Their status as British nationals overseas gives them no right to live anywhere and cannot be passed on to their children.

Government spokesmen have trotted out in this long series of debates all the old arguments of evasion and, excuse and supposed explanation. Let me briefly try to counter some of their obfuscation. These 11,000 or so British nationals overseas——

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: British overseas citizens.

Mr. Faulds: No, they will now be called British nationals (overseas) if the order is passed. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will catch up with that in time.

Those British nationals (overseas) are not planning en bloc to decamp from Hong Kong. Their lives are committed to that series of island territories. They simply seek the security of a proper citizenship, not a paper one. They do not want to have to leave their homes in Hong Kong. They just want that security of citizenship.

The agreement guaranteed right of abode to everyone who already has it but excluded non-Chinese from Chinese nationality. It is Her Majesty's Government's responsibility to put right their statelessness. It is not China's responsibility as those people are not nationals and China has no ultimate responsibility for them. The Government know that very well. Although I have been a long time friend of the People's Republic, I am convinced that if we abdicate our post-imperial responsibility, future Chinese Governments will behave with proper consideration. China does not abandon or abrogate its international commitment.

There were earlier arguments put forward by Her Majesty's Government that the Chinese majority in Hong Kong would resent special treatment for the minorities. That devious pretence was put paid to by the Legislative Council's generosity in stating its understanding of the vulnerability of people without a secure nationality. Indeed, it has endorsed the need for special treatment.

Finally, there was the argument that the People's Republic of China would consider special treatment as showing that the United Kingdom and Hong Kong Governments lacked faith in the agreement. The Chinese Government is much too sensible and much too sophisticated to credit such nonsense. Indeed, the pro Peking press in Hong Kong supported the proposed changes. One newspaper, which takes the official line, called in question the right of abode in Hong Kong, proffered by Her Majesty's Government, as having anything to do with citizenship as such.

All those who know Hong Kong best, from businessmen to parliamentarians—and there are many of them in the House—from journalists to ex-governors of the place, have urged the Government to be generous in this last exercise of our colonial exit. It can be only the lack of vision and the mean spirit of the present Prime Minister that prevents a proper resolution of this last issue.

The Foreign Secretary is a warm-hearted and generous individual, and so, indeed, is the Home Secretary, although he simulated some conviction in his speech a little earlier this evening. Ministers in both this House and the other place have made commitments in debate after debate that they would revise their views to take account of what was said in the various debates. Here, I must disagree with my old right hon. Friend who seemed to argue the contrary. I think that Blackpool is his place of abode normally. Ministers had need to do so because this matter has been pushed through on an Order in Council instead of through primary legislation, which the House could debate, and the point is then amend. If, indeed, both Houses had had that opportunity, they would have made an amendment on this particular issue.

I can best sum up the case that I think most of us in the House want to make tonight in the excellent coda to a document that some of us have received from the Joint Council for the Welfare of Immigrants. It states:

"The minorities in Hong Kong have won all the arguments, convinced the doubting and undermined all objections."—

I do not think that any of us in the House would disagree with that—

"The government's response is unworthy of the calibre of the debate and the breadth of concern in both Houses of Parliament. We would urge members of both Houses to restate their opposition to the unamended order and to insist that the government keeps its promise and acts in the spirit of the debates in Britain and in Hong Kong."

I think most of us in the House tonight would strongly endorse that argument.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): I shall detain the House for but a very few minutes.

I should like to add my welcome to the fact that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary was able to concede two of the three issues that exercised the minds of many hon. Members on both sides of the House during our debate on 16 January. However, I must also register my disappointment that my right hon. Friend has not felt able to concede British citizenship and the consequent right of abode here in Britain to the non-Chinese ethnic minority British dependent territories citizens. While, clearly, that was the most difficult of the three issues, I am as yet not persuaded that my right hon. Friend has come to the right conclusion.

I have read many thousands of words—I am sure that everyone has — on the subject since our debate in January, and they have become fairly repetitive. Since then it has become clear that because, under Chinese law, only ethnic Chinese BDTCs can become Chinese citizens, the non-ethnic minorities would become stateless in 1997. The British national (overseas) status for the former BDTCs and the grant of the nebulous British overseas citizenship to their children and grandchildren born after 1997 merely postpones statelessness to the fourth generation, unless the Chinese decide to amend their law. That is something that they seem singularly unwilling to do. As has been said by several people, the people in Peking seem to prefer to leave that question entirely to the British Government as they see it as our problem, not theirs.

It is also clear that the Chinese ethnic majority in Hong Kong is not seeking to use the non-ethnic minority as a Trojan horse to reopen the whole question of the status for Chinese BDTCs after 1997. Hence it cannot be claimed that there would be a knock-on effect in Hong Kong.

What about the possibility of a concession to the non-Chinese in Hong Kong being cited as a precedent at some future date should we give up any of our few remaining colonies thereafter? There seems to be no likelihood of any other colony being ceded to another sovereign power of such different political and philosophical status and attitude as the People's Republic. In the case of the Falklands and Gibraltar — two territories that could conceivably be ceded to another sovereign power rather than granted independence in their own right — very specific promises have been given that the will of the people of those two territories will be paramount—and in any case, we have already conceded precisely that right of abode to the Falkland islanders and Gibraltarians that the non-Chinese ethnic minorities in Hong Kong seek. I could quote Gibraltar and the Falklands Islands as a precedent for the non-Chinese ethnic minority in Hong Kong. I believe that the remaining British colonies— and I went through that very short list this evening— which consists of Anguilla, Bermuda, British Antarctic Territory, South Georgia and South Sandwich Islands, British Indian Ocean Territories, the British Virgin Islands, the Cayman Islands, Montserrat, the Pitcairn Islands, Saint Helena and Tristan Da Cunha and finally the Turks and Caicos Islands are unlikely to produce a situation similar to that in Hong Kong.

I am one of those who believe that this country has given a home to as many people from overseas as it can possibly absorb. None the less, I believe that in the case for the non-Chinese ethnic minority in Hong Kong, we are bound by the responsibilities of our colonial past to ensure that we do not bequeath a group of stateless children of British overseas citizens to the Government of 80 years from now. That would be a cop-out.

I will support the Government tonight, with some reservations. I will do so in the knowledge that, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker) said, there is still plenty of time for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to do what would be right by the non-Chinese ethnic minority in Hong Kong.

11.35 pm

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): I am sorry that the hon. Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) did not conclude his remarks by saying that he would follow the logic of his arguments and vote against the order. I agree with much of what he said, and his hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale (Sir F. Montgomery) put the case as succinctly as did any hon. Member in the debate. I was pleased that he concluded by saying that he would not support the order. That was the logical conclusion of the case that he advocated in his speech.

I was fortunate enough to be in Hong Kong over the Easter recess, and I discussed these matters at some length with the various groups involved, with representatives of the Council of Hong Kong Indian Associations and with Members of the Executive and Legislative Councils. The House should not underestimate the strength of feeling that still exists in Hong Kong on this issue.

The Government's decision on the endorsement on the passport is greatly welcomed in Hong Kong. It had been asked for vigorously by the people in Hong Kong for some time. One point that was made earlier in the debate is that there has been an irritating need for people to obtain and pay for entry certificates if they are not to have difficulties when they arrive at Heathrow or some other port of entry. I should like the Minister to assure the House that that will not be necessary with the new endorsement in the passport. There has also been a welcome in Hong Kong, as there has been throughout the House, for the Government's decision on the ex-service men.

There is still a unity of condemnation in Hong Kong of the Government's action over the non-ethnic Chinese, and also of their unwillingness to listen to the united voice of the people in Hong Kong and the strong voices of hon. Members here and in another place.

The Government and this country have a moral responsibility towards that relatively small group of people. During recent years the number of Vietnamese refugees that we have taken in from Hong Kong is roughly the same as the number of the non-ethnic Chinese community in Hong Kong about whom we are concerned. That puts the numbers that we are talking about into context.

I do not accept, and do not think that many hon. Members would accept, that because we advocate that the Government should accept the representations on this issue, we must say that the other people whom the Home Secretary mentioned should also have a right to come to this country. That does not follow, and we all believe that, because of the unique nature of the situation, a ring fence could and should be put around these 11,500 people and they should be allowed to come to this country. That does not reflect upon the unique and excellent agreement with the Chinese Government, because the Chinese have made it clear that they regard that as a British responsibility and that the British Government should accept their responsibility and act upon it.

These people do not want their right to live in Hong Kong to be subject to the powers of China, a country of which they are not nationals. Their statelessness and lack of an abode in the world, if they need it, is the basis of their claim to the House for British citizenship.

I believe that we could find a solution to the problem. Indeed, they themselves have suggested that there should be a cut-off date, which would ensure that a ring fence was put around the problem, that numbers were clearly identified and that a continuing commitment was not being accepted. They have suggested that approach and we should be prepared to accept it.

On that basis, we on these Benches believe that this injustice should be rectified. We would wish to rectify it, if the opportunity arose, before 1997. With that in mind we will vote against the order tonight, in the hope that at some stage it will be rectified.

Sir Paul Bryan (Boothferry): I should have thought that in this frustrating game of politics most of us have found that however worthy our objective, and however we persevere in pursuing it, we seldom achieve 100 per cent. success.

In approaching the order, the Legislative Council set their sights on three changes, of which their Members made sure that we were aware, and more than aware. Their effective campaigning has achieved two of their objectives; but the third only in part. I hope that they will not view that as a failure, but as a positive success, if not a 100 per cent. success.

The endorsement of the passports will be provided in full. It only remains for the Government to persuade other countries to respect it. British citizenship for those who served in the defence of Hong Kong is, quite rightly, granted.

The Home Secretary has explained the reasons for the Government's attitude to the claims of the third objective, that of the British dependent territories citizens who are not ethnically Chinese. Of course, our Indian friends will be very disappointed.

I ask them not to underrate, as the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) has done, the assurance in the Home Secretary's reply which reads:

> "If, however, any British national were in the future to come under pressure to leave Hong Kong, we would expect the Government of the day to consider sympathetically the case for admission to the United Kingdom." — [Official Report, 23 April 1986; Vol. 96, c. 148.]

The hon. Member for Battersea said that those words were inadequate, although he gave little in the way of an alternative. I took down his words. He talked about life being unpleasant or intolerable.

That is not an adequate substitute for those words in the statement. I consider the assurance that has been given to be exceptional. It is a serious step for a Government to commit their successors in this way. The assurance should not be scorned.

The changes should be seen as part of the broad and positive progress that is being made in Hong Kong on several important fronts. The machinery set up under the joint agreement is being seen to work. The all-important basic law drafting and consultative committees are regarded now by the people of Hong Kong with some confidence as a serious attempt by the Chinese to equate the law to the joint declaration. The original doubts as to the role of the joint liaison committee are beginning to fade, as its practical value is emerging. It has cleared the way for the endorsement of the passport, for entry into GATT with immediate and independent negotiating status and for membership of the Asian Development bank. The Land Commission, another body set up under the agreement, has shown itself to be flexible in dealing with the tricky problems involving revenue from land sales. These important changes are taking place against the background of Hong Kong's continuing prosperity and social development. Hong Kong will be building a third university by 1994, a unified stock exchange has been established and a housing authority——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. The hon. Gentleman must address his remarks to the subject matter of the order, which is British nationality.

Sir Paul Bryan: Great progress continues to be made in all the spheres to which I have referred. Such progress is vital for the future of Hong Kong. The additional progress that the order represents is part of the advance that we want to see, and provided the British Government and Hong Kong's friends in this House and in the other place continue to show our genuine commitment to its well-being, confidence there can be maintained in the difficult years to 1997.

11.4 pm

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): The essence of this debate is the Government's unreasonable and unjustified attitude to Hong Kong's non-Chinese ethnic minority. Their refusal to grant them right of abode in Britain is an abdication of a clear moral responsibility.

I appreciate that some hon. Members even some Ministers, feel that if Britain took the appropriate action, it would upset the Chinese and be interpreted as an expression of no confidence in the Sino British agreement. While I am a warm supporter of that agreement and would not do anything to damage it, there is no substance in the view that providing British citizenship for the non-Chinese ethnic minority would offend China. It has been made abundantly clear in recent months by, in particular, Mr. Xu Jia Tun, head of the Xinhua News Agency in Hong Kong, that the Chinese would have no objection to British citizenship being given to the non-Chinese ethnic minority.

In a recent letter to me, the Prime Minister said that no BDTCs in Hong Kong need fear statelessness, and the Home Secretary implied that in his remarks tonight. But that was a thoroughly misleading statement for the Prime Minister to have made. We understand the rights and privileges of citizenship. The new status conferred on BDTCs denies them the right of abode in Britain and denies them legitimate citizenship.

Statelessness is not avoided by handing out bits of paper. If it were, confetti would be invaluable. As we know, confetti merely showers good will. The members of the non-Chinese ethnic minority in Hong Kong do not just want good will. Nor do they want the sympathetic consideration offered them by the Home Secretary. They want rights. The Government are proferring a bogus kind of citizenship, one that is devoid of the basic right of abode. It is a counterfeit status which, like any forged banknote, seeks to convey credibility but which will not bear close inspection.

The Government should recognise that they are creating bitterness and disillusionment in Hong Kong. They should be aware that their refusal may force the ethnic minority to leave Hong Kong and to seek citizenship elsewhere. Those people are crucial to the success of this unique proposal for Hong Kong's future. Their departure would seriously damage Hong Kong. The Government should not allow their nightmare fears, nor those of some right hon. Gentlemen, to supersede justice.

The Government have rightly acknowledged that the joint declaration, creating "one country, two systems", was a unique and imaginative concept. To help the non-Chinese ethnic minority who are the unwitting victims of this remarkable and warmly welcomed development, the Government should show a generous and imaginative response. It is only by granting citizenship to this minority that the Government can rise to the occasion and also act with fairness and justice. I hope that the Government will think again.

11.50 pm

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): The order is important for the Indian community in Hong Kong but equally for the politics of Hong Kong. The hon. Member for Boothferry (Sir P. Bryan) was right to draw attention to the wider considerations which unfortunately——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman was quite wrong.

Dr. Bray: Indeed, Mr. Deputy Speaker. That is part of the problem. The people and the Legislative Council of Hong Kong attach particular importance to this House because it helps to build up their standing vis-a-vis the People's Republic of China in the difficult transition that they have to make.

Hong Kong made three requests. It is good that two of them should have been conceded by the Government. Some progress has been made. I agree that weight should be attached to the assurances given by the Home Secretary, but Hong Kong will make sure that the argument continues and is considered again by a future Government. I hope, therefore, that the Government will not be too discouraging.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): The debate has concentrated on the third request made by the Hong Kong Legislative and Executive Councils, but the House will not forget the extent to which the Government have responded to the views expressed in the House when we last discussed these matters and the extent to which we have taken account of the views then expressed, as promised. It cannot be suggested that that debate was a waste of time and that the Government responded with deaf ears.

My hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale (Sir F. Montgomery) was a little unfair in his comments about the procedure adopted. After all, we went to great lengths to follow a procedure which allowed the House to debate at length a draft Order in Council so that the Government could hear the views of the House and go away and consider them. We have met the wishes of Hong Kong on the passport endorsement. We recognise how important it is to the people of Hong Kong to know that genuine visitors will always be welcome here. In regard to other countries, the clear indication in the passport that the holder has the right of abode in Hong Kong, guaranteeing returnability to Hong Kong, should mean that the passport is every bit as acceptable as the present BDTC passport.

I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker) for his comments. The hon. Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds) was rather churlish and showed no comprehension of the difficulty involved in finding an exactly appropriate form of words to put on the passport to reflect the rights which all of us wish to see stated clearly in it.

We have also met entirely the wishes of Hong Kong on service men. I am glad that UMELCO has welcomed what we are doing as "a fitting recognition" of the service given by these people.

The arguments about those British dependent territories citizens who are not ethnically Chinese have been stated often, but I should stress a few points. We cannot accept, as suggested by the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) and by the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley), that a form of British nationality that does not carry with it a right of abode in Britain is not a genuine form of nationality. British overseas citizens are not stateless. They travel round the world on British passports. They are entitled to British consular protection. To accept that they are stateless is to accept that we have a continuing obligation to accept no fewer than 2 million BOCs living throughout the world.

I invite the House to remember that, while saying how valueless the citizenship was, the hon. Member for Battersea made a commitment that was so woolly as to be almost meaningless. All that he said was that if, unfortunately, a Labour Government returned to office, they would scrap the British Nationality Act 1981 and the Immigration Act 1971, and they would take account of the requests made by all sorts of people. What sort of an undertaking is that? What sort of a sign is it of the hon. Gentleman's true reaction to the order? What sign does it give us of the official Opposition's attitude to the order? It gives us no sign at all, and the hon. Gentleman might as well not have stood at the Dispatch Box. We are no wiser than we were before the debate as to where the Opposition stand on this matter.

The arguments of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) are always interesting. He said that we were extending British nationality to 3·25 million people. He did not mention that we are giving a different form of British nationality to 3·25 million people who already have British nationality, which is different from the impression which he may, unwittingly, have given during his speech.

My hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale said that the non-ethnic Chinese wish to continue living in Hong Kong. We cannot give them the right to do so by conferring upon them British citizenship, but we have won them the right to do so by the agreement. That agreement is binding in international law, and it will be written into a basic law governing the Hong Kong special administrative region. British citizenship cannot be transmitted further than to the second generation born abroad, so British citizenship could not give to the non-ethnic Chinese a nationality that could be transmitted to their descendants any further than the British overseas citizenship which, under the order, can be transmitted to their children and grandchildren born after 1997.

That is an answer to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman). We could no more guarantee British citizenship to the children and grandchildren of those people beyond the second generation born abroad by granting them British citizenship than we could by granting them British overseas citizenship.

We must remember our commitment as a Government to a firm immigration policy, but I repeat that if any non-ethnic Chinese BDTCs were at any time to come under pressure to leave Hong Kong, we would expect the Government of the day to consider sympathetically their admission to the United Kingdom on a case-by-case basis. That has been described as a "strong moral commitment". I agree with that description.

It being one and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted Business).

Resolved,

That the draft Hong Kong (British Nationality) Order 1986, which was laid before this House on 7th May, be approved.

Heathrow-Gatwick Helicopter Link

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Neubert.]

12.11 am

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): I am very grateful for this opportunity to debate the Heathrow to Gatwick helicopter airlink. It is an issue of profound importance to my constituents.

The licence was originally granted to British Caledonian Airways Ltd. and British Airways Helicopters Ltd. for one year only in 1978. A new application was granted in 1979 for four years. In 1983, British Caledonian and British Airways Helicopters Ltd. jointly applied to continue the service for a further 10 years. The Civil Aviation Authority granted the application on 1 February 1984, but, on 10 June 1984, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport directed the CAA to vary the licence so that it would terminate four months after the M25 motorway between Reigate and Wisley was opened.

On 21 November 1985, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State issued a direction to the CAA that, if the licence did not expire first, it should be revoked from 7 February 1986. British Caledonian applied for deletion of this note in the licence requiring it to cease operations.

The four conditions of this licence, which have remained unchanged since it was originally granted in 1978, are onerous. None of them is normally found in CAA licences for air transport operations, but they were considered necessary by the CAA in view of the particular nature of the operation.

In November and December 1985 the CAA held a hearing that lasted for 16 working days to deal with the application. In reaching its decision, the CAA took into account many factors and heard many witnesses who fully represented the views of the operators and the objectors. In its decision, handed down on 4 February 1986, it considered at great length the legal framework, the economic arguments, costs, revenue implications, airline competition and airports policy, the users, the choice between Airlink and Speedlink, the M25 motorway, the environment and the disturbance caused to it, present and proposed routes and the minimisation of disturbance. It acted as the responsible, expert body that it undoubtedly is.

Having considered all the arguments for and against the continuation of this important service, the CAA concluded that Airlink should continue with effect from such date as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State notified it. The CAA accordingly gave notice to the Secretary of State of its decision, and the Secretary of State indicated that he would need some time to consider the matter. However, before he had stated his position, in accordance with the earlier directive on the licence, the service ceased on 7 February this year.

The Secretary of State then invited representations from involved parties to the CAA's decision. The operator's own representation stressed the low number of relevant written objections and of non-Airlink incidents, the general misconceptions about the matter, the possibility that the joint local authorities' objections had not been based on proper advice and the exaggerated effects of Airlink on the environment.

British Caledonian pointed out that it had offered new routes and altitudes to reduce environmental impact on particular areas at its own instigation and not as a CAA requirement, following earlier discussions between some of the objectors and Airlink staff. British Caledonian welcomed the M25 but questioned its ability to provide a suitable route both now and in the future—a question subsequently entirely justified by experience.

Further, the CAA in its earlier decision had agreed that travel by road remained an imperfect substitute for many Airlink passengers. British Caledonian pointed out that Speedlink could not possibly match the Airlink service, was not a suitable alternative and could never achieve the competitiveness needed by the London airports system.

Since its inception in 1978, the Airlink service has become a vital element in the London airports system. It has earned £10·5 million directly and £100 million in interline revenue for the London airports. Airlink has created 62 jobs and carried 600,000 passengers. I estimate that nearly half the existing passengers will in future avoid London if Airlink ceases—a potential loss of revenue to British Caledonian of £5 million to £6 million, and of about £14 million to United Kingdom airlines overall.

The management of British Caledonian — I am inclined to agree—believes that Airlink is being used as a scapegoat for environmental objections. The Government have paid scant regard to environmental objections to the Channel tunnel, with wide compulsory purchase powers being granted for land purchase. My right hon. Friend has suddenly adopted what appears to me to be a pious attitude to a service to which the environmental objections are questionable, and which produces much income for the United Kingdom in terms of tourist traffic and the utilisation of the London airports.

Motorway access is already proving unsatisfactory, especially at peak times in the morning and afternoon, which already coincide with airline peak times. The M25 is already heavily congested and Surrey police have now observed that, when a blockage occurs on the M25 in peak times, it creates a one-mile tailback in four minutes.

Traffic levels are now three or four years in advance of predicted levels, and in a year or two they will increase to a wholly unacceptable and extreme level. A blockage is now normal every day during morning and afternoon rush hours, yet the Minister is suggesting that Airlink should wait a year or two to see what the traffic position will be. The United Kingdom tourist industry cannot and will not thrive on such extraordinary complacency. If the Minister is so convinced that the motorway is adequate, he should see for himself the congestion at peak hours. He would then realise the deep anger and frustration felt by anyone with an urgent connection to catch at Gatwick or Heathrow.

I come now to the disparities between Gatwick and Heathrow in the number of destinations operated. The frequency of services from Gatwick is inferior to Heathrow. Gatwick has 115 destinations, Heathrow 223 —almost twice the number. The connecting helicopter service greatly reduces the impact of that imbalance.

The Government's twin White Papers on airline competition and airports policy set out a future in which Government support for the commercial development of aviation business would be strong, would develop and would build up competition. They envisaged a twin airports system and effective competition with foreign airlines. How is the Airlink decision helpful to British aviation in the light of those White Papers? Airlink was described in the BAA's 1978 report and accounts as:

"the symbol of London's twin airports policy."

[Mr. Nicholas Soames]

Surely, in Industry Year of all years, the Government should not have a policy of frustrating transport links.

This decision will end the productive and useful employment of a number of people. I should warn the House that, in my judgment, many more jobs are less secure because of what will prove to be a serious loss of revenue to British Caledonian.

The Minister's decision ignores the efforts made to meet objections in terms of changes of routeing and flights at higher altitudes. The environmental disturbance relating to that single source has been grossly overstated. Airlink represents only 20 per cent. of total helicopter movements in the west London area.

The French have an Airlink service between the Paris airports, despite the peripherique motorway. The cities of Tokyo and New York have helicopter linking services. Indeed, a British helicopter links Wall street with the New York airports. Houston has just introduced a city link helicopter service, for which landing fees have been waived for a specific period. Concorde aircraft do not meet any of the current noise requirements, yet they are permitted to operate charter flights from London Heathrow.

Surely it is discrimination of the worst possible kind when the S61 aircraft, which meets all the current and proposed noise emission standards for helicopters, is denied permission to operate. Where is the equity in that? Before the CAA, there were paraded a large number of professional witnesses who gave objective evidence on noise. Why, if the environmental issue was such a prime requirement, was that expert evidence ignored? Why has the Minister substituted his own beliefs for the expert evidence of others? The Secretary of State knows that a surface connection can never match the Airlink, and that the significant benefits of an airside connection will be lost.

The Speedlink coach service between 8 February and 3 May this year operated at about a 15 per cent. load factor. It carried, on average, six passengers per journey, at a time when there was no competition from Airlink, which stopped on 7 February. Before it stopped, Airlink, in competition with Speedlink, was operating at 50 per cent. load factors. The figures speak for themselves. How long will the Speedlink service continue at those passenger levels? Will my hon. Friend the Minister take steps to ensure that it continues?

Finally, I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will consider carefully why British Caledonian needs this operation. He must ask himself why a private carrier would have fought so hard for so long—since 1978—and would have attracted so much adverse publicity at such considerable cost to itself in terms of time, effort and money, to operate the Airlink, unless it seriously and conscientiously believed in the route and its value and profitability—an objective endorsed by many respected users and organisations, including the Air Transport Users Committee.

British Caledonian has a record of successful operations. It has consistently made a profit. It creates jobs and provides a valuable boost to the United Kingdom economy. Is it right that, when it has suffered several times recently because of events over which it has no control, the Government now reward its endeavours by restricting it yet further? I greatly hope that my hon. Friend will, in equity and in accordance with Government aviation policy, permit the service to resume at once.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham) rose——

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I assume that the two hon. Gentlemen seeking to participate have the consent of both the hon. Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) and the Minister.

Sir Peter Hordern: I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) on choosing this subject, and on the forceful way in which he has put his case.

I feel sorry for British Caledonian that it has been treated so harshly. It could have expected and should have received much better treatment from the Government. It needed the helicopter link to continue its operations, and the Government should have allowed it much more time to experiment with different height levels to see whether the environmental objections could be overcome.

I am surprised at the decision of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport, considering his decision about the Channel tunnel. We were told that it did not matter if a service was to be provided across the Channel, and was to be built by private enterprise. Environmental issues were swept to one side. He was in favour of an improvement in services for passengers who wished to cross the Channel. But this helicopter link will no longer be available to those who like to use Gatwick or Heathrow airports, and must change flights rapidly. That is sad.

In announcing this change in a written answer, my right hon. Friend said that he was minded to make the change because of the improved motorways and the improved coach services, which would be able to ply so rapidly between Heathrow and Gatwick. The London Standard said this evening that the Surrey police have said that traffic using the motorway between Heathrow and Gatwick can at times tail back 10 miles from the M25-M3 interchange, while a 14-mile tail back in the M3 traffic waiting to join the M25 has been recorded. Anyone who has experienced delay on the M25 can but wonder at the decision by my right hon. Friend.

As for using the motor coaches, and the new rapid means of transport that the M25 will allow, that can be described only as a figment of the imagination. This is sad decision, but I noticed that my right hon. Friend said that he would allow time for experiment, and if it were found that the transport difficulties in getting from Heathrow to Gatwick were great, he would consider allowing the helicopter link to return. I hope that his decision will be reversed soon.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): As a consultant to British Caledonian, I know that the airline considers the helilink to be a vital element in developing services at Gatwick in competition with British Airways. The House will recall that that is basis of the Government's aviation policy, as outlined in a White Paper 18 months ago. The decision that we are debating places a major impediment on British Caledonian in achieving the Government's objective.

All other cities with two or three airports are linked by helicopter, including Paris, New York and Tokyo. That shows that in other countries, although the same environmental consideration must surely apply, there is a considerable understanding of the need, when advancing aviation, to have such a helicopter link.

Whether or not we like it, the first class and business class passengers, which all airlines must attract if they are to maximise their revenue, simply will not use a coach service. The fact that they have to check in and out of customs and immigration if they are travelling from one airport to the other by road, which is not necessary with the helicopter link, undoubtedly reduces the ability of British Caledonian to continue to provide a competitive service.

Another small matter that may have been overlooked by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in reaching his decision is that in airline timetables throughout the world it is possible to include the time for a link run by a helicopter but not to include a coach service link.

The impression has been given that, as a result of the decision, the people immediately below the flight path of the British Caledonian helilink will be free from noise. However, it is estimated that no more than 20 per cent. of the total noise created by helicopters is created by this one. Even after the decision, some 80 per cent. of the noise will continue to be experienced. It is a pity that so much of the noise appears to be blamed on the British Caledonian helilink when private helicopters will continue to create a noise.

I know that my hon. Friend the Minister is well disposed to British Caledonian, and that he has frequently expressed considerable admiration for the way in which it has triumphed through many difficulties, and is now in a relatively profitable condition. I appeal to him. We need more than words—we need action. That action could, with great advantage, be an announcement by him to reconsider this decision, which flies in the face of all that British Caledonian has sought to do in recent years.

12.29 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Michael Spicer): My hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) has been as eloquent and vigorous in support of his constituents' interest as he always is. In this case, he has emphasised the employment opportunities offered by British Caledonian. On that and other matters, my hon. Friend has been ably supported by my hon. Friends the Members for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) and for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern).

I accept what my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley said about the importance and excellence of British Caledonian. My hon. Friends have argued strongly for the retention of the helicopter link between Heathrow and Gatwick airports. I have to say what I am sure they already know—that many other hon. Members have argued no less passionately in the House and outside that the helicopter link should cease. The future of the helicopter link has become a highly controversial issue, the resolution of which was bound to invoke the anger of one side or the other.

The number of representations clearly illustrates the strength of feeling on both side about the issue. After publishing the application, the Civil Aviation Authority received 2,225 objections, of which 949 were within the deadline allowed by the regulations. At the hearing, the authority heard British Caledonian and the Air Transport Users Committee in support of the application, as well as 25 parties representing objectors. In addition, we have received about 1,000 representations, including many hon. Members, local authorities, airlines, airports, residents' associations, other local bodies and members of the public. We have received two petitions—one in support of the helicopter link and one opposed to it. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have met two deputations of hon. Members—again, one in support of the link and one opposed to it.

There has therefore been no shortage of information on which to base a decision. Naturally, we considered very carefully the Civil Aviation Authority's decision to grant British Caledonian's application, as well as the evidence submitted to the Authority, the transcript of the public hearing, and the representations made to us.

The decision which my right hon. Friend now has to take is whether to specify a date for the resumption of the Heathrow-Gatwick helicopter link, or whether instead to direct the Civil Aviation Authority not to issue a licence for the service in order to prevent the environmental disturbance caused by the helicopter. In reaching this decision, my right hon. Friend has to weigh the environmental disturbance against the economic benefits of allowing the helicopter link to continue, and this must include an evaluation of the alternatives available to passengers who wish to travel between Heathrow and Gatwick.

I shall deal first with the question of environmental disturbance to which the Civil Aviation Authority cannot give the same weight as the Secretary of State for Transport. Without doubt, there is widespread and intense opposition to the helicopter link on the grounds of the environmental disturbance that it causes. This opposition has been increased by two aspects of the present application. First, the proposal to operate the helicopter link over three routes has increased the number of people who will be affected by the environmental disturbance. Secondly, the firm expectation following from a previous decision that the helicopter link would cease four months after the opening of the M25 has produced dismay and anger among those who thought that the issue could not be re-opened. We are conscious that some of the claims about the environmental disturbance caused by the helicopter have been exaggerated—this point was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley—but, even after making full allowance for this consideration, it remains the case that the helicopter link has caused, and would continue to cause, widespread and genuine annoyance and distress.

I now turn to the economic benefits of the helicopter link between Heathrow and Gatwick. We accept that British Caledonian, as well as other British airlines and the airports, earn valuable revenue from passengers interlinking over the London airport system. If such passengers are to continue to be attracted to the London airports system, there must be fast, frequent, comfortable and reliable links between Heathrow and Gatwick. Good links between the two airports will expand the choice of services available to travellers with their origins or destinations in the United Kingdom by enabling them to regard services from Heathrow and Gatwick as alternatives.

There is no doubt that, in the past, the helicopter link between Heathrow and Gatwick has proved a valuable facility for passengers wishing to travel between the two airports. But the value of the helicopter link has been reduced now that the M25 has opened up motorway travel between the airports. If I have time I shall address myself to the effectiveness of that motorway link.

The speedlink coach service, operated by London Country, provides a frequent service with a high standard of comfort on board the coach as well as dedicated lounges at the airport terminals. London Country also operates the cheaper, but still direct, Jetlink 747 service. Alternatively, passengers can make use of the taxis and self-drive hire cars. Some may now find it more attractive to use their own cars.

These services and facilities offer travellers between the two airports a good choice of speed, comfort, convenience and price. We accept that continuing the helicopter link would expand this choice still further. In particular, we recognise the convenience to interlining passengers of an airside to airside helicopter service. But we believe that the wide range of alternatives to the helicopter should prove acceptable to the majority of travellers between the airports, and we hope that certain improvements to them will enhance their attractiveness to interlining passengers.

It may be that a few interlining passengers will be discouraged from using the London airports system because of their own perceptions of road transport or because a few connections which were possible by helicopter will not be possible by road, or because with the helilink they are able to change airports without going through customs or immigration.

We have looked very carefully at the various estimates of how many interlining passengers might be lost to British Caledonian and other British airlines, and what that could amount to in terms of loss of revenue and profit.

While we would not wish to understate the possible loss, we believe that some of the claims that have been made have been exaggerated, and we hope that the potential loss could be kept to the minimum by all those concerned taking a positive and aggressive approach to promoting the alternative road connections.

Weighing those arguments against each other has not been easy. Having, however, considered all the arguments, the evidence and the representations with the greatest care, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced last week that he was minded to give the Civil Aviation Authority a direction preventing a resumption of the Heathrow to Gatwick helicopter link.

In our view, the environmental disturbance caused by the helicopter link can no longer be justified now that fast alternative connections are available which should prove acceptable to the majority of passengers wishing to travel between the two airports.

As required under section 6 of the Civil Aviation Act 1982, my right hon. Friend has consulted the Civil Aviation Authority before giving it a direction, and our officials have written to British Caledonian. The authority has said that it has no comments to make on the proposal that the Secretary of State should issue a direction.

We realise that the announcement will have come as a great disappointment to British Caledonian and to the many hon. Members and others who have supported the continuation of the helicopter link. It has not made our task any easier to know that, whatever my right hon. Friend decided, we would disappoint as many people as we satisfied. But it is the responsibility of Government to make hard choices, and we cannot shirk that.

My right hon. Friend made it clear in his statement that in certain circumstances he would be prepared to look again at the need for a scheduled helicopter service between Heathrow and Gatwick, if the question were to be referred to him at a future date.

Given that the balance between the environmental disturbance caused by the helicopter link and its economic benefits is fine, it would be wrong for us to suggest that the balance could never shift. For example—this was referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley—there can be no guarantee that adequate surface links between the airports will be maintained in terms of speed, frequency and quality of the available services and facilities.

Nor should we rule out the possibility of operating an air link at some future date in such a way that significantly reduced the environmental impact. But any such reappraisal must be for the future, and after the alternatives to the helicopter link have had a year or two to prove themselves.

I very much hope that once my right hon. Friend has formally announced his decision, the issue will be accepted as closed, at least for the time being. The main task then will be to make the surface links work as well as possible.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-two minutes to One o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Small and Medium-Sized Firms

1. Mr. Bright asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what his Department is doing to improve the export marketing of small and medium-sized British firms.

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Alan Clark): The services offered by the British Overseas Trade Board provide valuable support for companies' export marketing. About three quarters of those using these services are smaller companies employing fewer than 200 people. The British Overseas Trade Board is currently running a series of conferences on export marketing throughout the United Kingdom, which are designed primarily for smaller companies and those new to exporting.

Mr. Bright: I welcome my hon. Friend's answer, but will he take it a step further? Bearing in mind that, in the latter half of this year, we shall hold the presidency of the EEC Commission, is it possible to get to grips with a situation in which many firms have to manufacture to different specifications for each European country? As a business man, I know how difficult it is for a small company to do that. What are the prospects of ironing out that problem?

Mr. Clark: My hon. Friend is right. The essence of the internal market, which consists of 330 million consumers, is that there should be free circulation of goods without artificial impediments. The harmonisation of technical standards is one of the most important of those elements.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Why does the hon. Gentleman think that tiny companies in Italy — often cottage industries—can manufacture knitwear and other textile products which feed into large units and then into exports, but apparently we cannot cope with such a system here?

Mr. Clark: That simply constitutes a different approach to marketing. If British manufacturers do not adopt that approach, there must be very good reasons for it.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Is it not a fact that about 6,000 firms in this country with turnovers of between £1 million and £10 million a year do not export? Does my hon. Friend agree that this presents just the right target for the BOTB's attention?

Mr. Clark: It is perfectly true that breaking into export markets can be time-consuming and expensive. Many firms may find it more appropriate to wait for customers to come to them, and thus opportunities are lost. The BOTB's initiatives in this respect are extremely valuable. The board holds a number of conferences which are extremely well attended by business men at which it explains what facilities are available.

Mr. Evans: Why has there been such little progress in the harmonisation of technical standards in the EEC? Is it not a fact that the Europeans can apparently export goods to this country with impunity, but we cannot export to them?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Member on the right question?

Mr. Evans: Yes, Mr. Speaker. It is about technical standards.

Mr. Speaker: Is it about export marketing of small and medium-sized firms?

Mr. Evans: Yes, Sir. The Minister should answer.

Mr. Clark rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Mr. Couchman.

Mr. Couchman: My hon. Friend may care to know that a strong team from my borough of Gillingham has just visited Japan. The team included the chief executive, the leader of the council and people from the enterprise agency and the chamber of commerce. They made valuable contacts, but they were struck by the difficulties faced by firms, especially small companies, in penetrating that market. Is there not a case for the Department to set up a regular and consistent counselling service for small companies so that they gain expertise in this regard?

Mr. Clark: The British Overseas Trade Board does have such a service. I would very much like my hon. Friend to ask his delegation to communicate with my Department and report on what it found. I am doing my best to build up a picture of the various difficulties and restrictions faced by British exporters to Japan, and the more material that I can have presented the better.

Mr. John Smith: Will the Minister now kindly answer the question put to him by my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans), which was highly relevant to export marketing and technical standards, which, as the Minister should know, is very much at the heart of our potential export success? If he does not know the answer, will he just say so?

Mr. Clark: It is far too early for the right hon. and learned Gentleman to take this ludicrous and pompous line. He knows perfectly well that if Mr. Speker had wished me to answer that I would have done so. I cannot remember whether the hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) was even in the Chamber when I answered the question initially. I said that the harmonisation of technical standards was the most important single element in the completion of the internal market.

Mr. Stokes: In spite of all the help which the Government are at present giving to firms in this country, does my hon. Friend agree that the prime responsibility is for the management of British firms? Firms in my constituency, which export all over the world, do not go to the Government with a begging bowl all the time.

Mr. Clark: I congratulate the firms in my hon. Friend's constituency. However, I do not think that we are talking about a begging bowl. We are talking about the difficulties that many small firms experience in starting to export on their own account in the first instance. To help them with that, the BOTB is extremely useful.

Tin Mining Industry

2. Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the latest situation within the tin mining industry.

The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Mr. Peter Morrison): The Department has received applications for assistance from Geevor and RTZ. We have already made it clear that we will give urgent consideration to projects designed to make the mines competitive in the new market situation.

Mr. Rogers: Will the Minister constantly bear in mind the importance of the tin industry to an area which already has severe unemployment and a fragile economy? Will the Government give an undertaking to help that area and the tin industry, and not turn their back on it as they have done with most other British industries, are about to do with the shipbuilders, and as the Minister for Trade did on the question from my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans)?

Mr. Morrison: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that I know the area. I have visited the tin mines and have been down them. I am more than aware of the implications of those tin mines having to close. That is precisely why we are looking very carefully at the applications that have been put to our Department.

Mr. Harris: Will my hon. Friend accept my thanks for his response to my personal plea that the Government should find some money to enable Geevor's pumps to keep going while the application is being considered? When he considers the application from Geevor and from Carnon Consolidated, will he bear in mind the phrase from the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, when it said that it believed that the Cornish tin industry was worth saving, because the whole of Cornwall believes that as well?

Mr. Morrison: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for referring to the fact that, with the Cornish county council, we have been able to provide a period of some four weeks to look at the development of Geevor tin mine's application. Certainly my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I will bear in mind what the Select Committee said on this important subject.

Mr. Penhaligon: Does the Minister have any idea how weak his answer to the fundamental question posed appears to those in Cornwall? We recognise that Government decisions sometimes take longer than many of us would desire, but some six and a half months have passed since the crisis started. There have been numerous meetings—I pay homage to the Minister for having the meetings—but no decision has appeared. People in the far south-west are wondering just when the Government expect to reach a conclusion. Can the Minister give us some idea of when he expects the review to be completed?

Mr. Morrison: With respect, the hon. Gentleman is being less than fair. He will be aware that RTZ put in its application less than two weeks ago. It is impossible to decide whether an application is viable until we receive it and look at it carefully. He should also be aware, after meetings that I have had with the trade unions, that they would want us to look at those applications very carefully and not rush them.

Mr. Williams: Nevertheless, it is six months since the Minister saw the crisis emerging. How much more governmental dither and indifference must Cornwall suffer? The Government have taken millions of pounds in regional aid from the south-west in the past few years, and plan to take millions more in the next few years. Is it not time that they put some of that money back?

Mr. Morrison: By the tone of his question, the right hon. Gentleman wants me just to say no without looking very carefully at the viability of the applications. I am looking carefully. I am encouraging the companies to come forward with viable applications. That is what they and the trade unions would want me to do.

European Regional Development Fund

3. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the value of the grants allocated to England from the European regional development fund since its inception?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. John Butcher): About £997 million.

Mr. Knox: Does my hon. Friend think that the size and extent of those grants has been sufficiently well publicised in this country? If not, what steps does he propose to take to ensure that the public are aware of the level of assistance that we receive from the fund?

Mr. Butcher: I think that there is awareness among the key clients of that area of expenditure, particularly among local authorities and those who bring forward applications for infrastructure investment. It is the major section of spending under this head of account. Obviously, we would look for methods of improving the publicity, particularly to the private sector applicants, but in the main we are satisfied that the volume of applications is being matched by the funds available.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Does the Minister not agree that, in comparison with the scale of funds given out through the common agricultural policy, the funds given out for regional policy by the Community are very small indeed? What are the Government doing to seek to increase them, to help the regions where unemployment is so high?

Mr. Butcher: I do not think that the amount spent here is ungenerous. I accept the implication of what the hon. Gentleman is saying, that this area of spending has benefits for the United Kingdom which are greater than usual. I should inform the hon. Gentleman that the United Kingdom's share of the fund in 1985 was £345 million, representing about 26 per cent. of the total budget. In terms of applications, in 1986 the United Kingdom's share is about £376 million, which is about 19 per cent.

Mr. Hill: Will my hon. Friend confirm that applications will be made to the European development fund for the infrastructure that will be needed on this side of the Channel for the Channel tunnel? Is it not a fact that most of the funds seem to be earmarked for infrastructure? Would that not be a good thing?

Mr. Butcher: In the main, the areas that receive assistance from the fund coincide with our domestically identified assisted areas. My hon. Friend raises a particularly interesting point. The best thing to do at this stage is to agree to look at that, given that it is an especially European—I stress European—venture.

Mr. Gordon Brown: Is the Minister not aware that, despite the figures he mentioned, regional aid has been halved under this Government, and is to be halved yet again? Was it the EEC that insisted that access to the assisted areas grant be restricted to 35 per cent. of the working population, or was it the Government who made that decision? Will the Minister consider an urgent review of the assisted areas map? Will he bear in mind that 3 million people are now in areas with unemployment rates of between 15 and 26 per cent., yet those areas receive no regional development grants and no regional selective assistance?

Mr. Butcher: I am grateful for the opportunity to restate the circumstances against which the 35 per cent. area coverage was brought about. During the Government's review of United Kingdom industrial regional aid in 1984, we were given to understand that if we were to seek Commission approval for an assisted area map covering more than 35 per cent. of the working population of Great Britain, the Commission saw little likelihood that it would approve that. Reductions might have been forced upon us to bring the coverage down to 35 per cent., or even less, which was likely. In the circumstances, the Government decided to set the map coverage at 35 per cent., and that was accepted by the Commission.

Mr. Forth: Has my hon. Friend made any estimate of the likely impact of the enlargement of the EEC to include Spain and Portugal on the United Kindom's share of the regional development fund? Does he agree that to attempt constantly to move economic resources around arbitrarily where they do not want to go is a futile exercise anyway?

Mr. Butcher: Where possible, these forms of assistance should be coloured by the needs of market forces. I understand my hon. Friend's point, but hon. Members on both sides of the House voted for Portuguese and Spanish accession to the Community, and it was almost inevitable that our share of the budget would fall.

Cable-producing Industry

4. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will discuss with relevant manufacturers the future of the United Kingdom cable-producing industry.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I would be happy to discuss with the industry any specific points it might wish to raise about its future. I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for bringing a delegation to see me yesterday.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The Minister is aware of the closure by Sterling Greengate Cables of a factory in Trafford park in Manchester and the movement of some of that work to Aldermaston, where unemployment is much less of a problem than it is in the north-west. In his discussions with manufacturers, especially multinationals such as the one to which I referred, will the Minister point out, not only that they have social obligations to areas such as the north-west, but that the Government demand that their investment plans should include a recognition of the geographic dispersion of that investment?

Mr. Morrison: As I said to the hon. Gentleman when he raised the matter with me yesterday, regional grants are based on precisely the premise that he has advocated. I remind him that my constituency is about 30 miles down the road from Trafford park, which he represents and where many of his constituents work, so I understand his point.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Is my hon. Friend aware that the United Kingdom cable industry enjoys an excellent reputation throughout the world? It has contributed substantially to the United Kingdom export drive, but it is deeply worried about the EEC proposals on product liability, which it perceives to be very damaging, and which could assist non-EEC importers.

Mr. Morrison: I have looked into product liability. I should be happy to be told more about it, but I am assured that it need not be a problem for the industry.

Mr. Eastham: Do the Government have any strategy for the cable manufacturing industry, or do they intend to leave it to market forces? That would mean that the cheapest markets, irrespective of where they are, would take from Britain this industry, which is valuable and strategically important to it.

Mr. Morrison: I agree that the industry is important. That is why, in the aid and trade provision, substantial sums go indirectly, if not directly, to the cable industry. The hon. Gentleman is aware that substantial sums have been spent to attract new cable manufacturers to Britain. Only last week I visited a manufacturer in the north-east who was successfully using the most modern methods of production.

Financial Services (Provision)

5. Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied with the progress towards the harmonisation of the provision of financial services throughout the European Economic Community; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: My aim is freedom to offer a diversity of services. Progress towards the full achievement of this objective has been disappointingly slow. I hope it will now quicken, given the high priority attached to it by Community Heads of Government.

Mr. Stern: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the greatest barriers to a true market in financial services throughout the EEC is the restrictive practices that exist in so many of those services in Britain and in other EEC countries? Will he bend his efforts towards persuading individual providers of services to reduce those restrictive practices as much as possible?

Mr. Clark: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. We have already made progress in unit trusts. Recent judgments in the European Court will make it easier to advance in non-life insurance. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer hopes to carry forward the mortgage credit proposals that will allow building societies to invest in property outside their territory.

Sir John Farr: What attention is my hon Friend's Department giving to the unfair protection laws that exist in many Community countries, especially in Germany in respect of its domestic insurance markets?

Mr. Clark: My hon. Friend has identified a market that is proving to be especially difficult. The matter must be agreed in the Council of Ministers. Perhaps when majority voting is introduced it will be easier to make progress in that area.

Mr. Gould: Will the Minister bear in mind in any harmonisation exercise our unfortunate experience with the EEC listing particulars directive and ensure that any future harmonisation is attuned to the needs of our financial services industry, which is, after all, the most powerful in Europe?

Mr. Clark: I shall do my best to advance and nurture the interests of our financial services industry, but, as the hon. Gentleman well knows, each Minister will be endeavouring to achieve the best result for his domestic industry and it is that contest which makes these councils sometimes such a labourious business.

Research and Development

6. Mr. Powley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much his Department is spending on support for research and development; and if he will give comparable figures for 1979-80.

The Minister for Information Technology (Mr. Geoffrey Pattie): My Department plans to spend £415 million in 1986-87 on support for research and development. The comparable figure for 1979-80 was £142 million.

Mr. Powley: I thank my hon. Friend for that informative answer, but does he agree that the Government have an important and continuing role in research and development alongside industry and commerce? What efforts have been made in the Norwich area in that direction?

Mr. Pattie: I agree with my hon. Friend. Under the support for innovation scheme, 11 projects worth over £8 million are being supported in the Norwich travel-to-work area with grants of nearly £1·4 million. The technologies supported include electrical engineering, food machinery and printing. One of the largest recipients of DTI support in the area has been Datron Electronics, which manufactures electronic test and measurement equipment. I plan to vist that company in the near future, and I look forward to seeing the results of my Department's support.

Mr. Lamond: In view of the tremendous success of the A320 Airbus, which managed to achieve 81 definite orders in the first 10 months of last year and employs about 30,000 people in Britain, is there any chance of some of that £405 million being given as a loan as a launch-aid and research and development aid to the A330 and A340?

Mr. Pattie: The hon. Gentleman is understating the case on the A320, which has already been the subject of launch-aid, because when I checked a few days ago there were about 130 orders with deposits.

I answered the question about the A330 and A340 on a previous occasion when I said that we await the discussions with British Aerospace and the Airbus consortium, which have yet to decide whether they want to proceed with those projects.

Mr. Pawsey: I appreciate what my hon. Friend has done for research and development, but what plans has he to encourage industry to do more R and D? Does he agree with mergers, for example between companies such as GEC and Plessey, which would then concentrate resources on research and development, to the benefit of the nation in penetrating export markets abroad?

Mr. Pattie: I am sure that my hon. Friend would not want me to comment on that particular example when it is still the subject of a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. It is obviously advantageous to British industry to have certain centres of excellence within industry, and there can be advantages in some companies coming together to provide a scale that will enable them to compete in international markets. We would expect an increase in research in industry to come from an increase in improved profitability, and at present profitability levels are at their highest since 1973.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: Will the Minister confirm, however, that under the important support for innovation scheme funds available have been cut this year and will be cut further next year? Is he aware that the Treasury attitude towards United Kingdom expenditure on research and development in Europe is damaging to British interests? Can he assure the House that United Kingdom contributions to such programmes as EUREKA and ESPRIT in Europe are not being offset by cuts in national United Kingdom programmes in Britain?

Mr. Pattie: Yes, I can give the hon. Gentleman that assurance, because we have made it clear that EUREKA and ESPRIT programmes will be funded up to what industry regards as satisfactory levels. There is a planned reduction in the support for innovation scheme, because we have increased the provision on awareness programmes, technology transfer programmes, advisory services and industry education, by 25 per cent.

Commercial Vehicle Industry

7. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proposals he has for the future of the commercial vehicle industry in Britain.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The future of this industry, as of others, will be determined by market demand and its ability to compete.

Mr. Dalyell: What advice would the Minister give to a skilled man from Bathgate who wishes to continue his career somewhere in the British commercial vehicle industry?

Mr. Morrison: As the hon. Gentleman knows, I am concerned about the position at Bathgate and I have made every possibility——

Mr. Canavan: Answer the question.

Mr. Morrison: I will answer the question.

I have made every possibility available to see whether there are new industries that will come, as has my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland. The hon. Gentleman will know that unless the truck industry becomes competitive there will be no truck industry, but there may be opportunities for the person to whom the hon. Gentleman referred at the Leyland Trucks plant.

Mr. Madel: Will my hon. Friend confirm that one way to secure thousands of jobs in our commercial vehicle industry is to get more American investment? To that end, will he confirm that he is constantly reminding General Motors that more investment by that company in this country, especially in Bedfordshire, is not only beneficial for it, but is very beneficial for us?

Mr. Morrison: I can certainly confirm that the Bedford plant in Bedfordshire is very important indeed and that, over a long period, General Motors has invested substantial sums in that plant, which, until recently, has provided a healthy and viable industry and livelihoods for many thousands of employees.

Mr. Hoyle: What discussions did the Secretary of State have with Mr. Robert Stempel of General Motors when they met in New York on 4 May? Did they discuss Bedford and Leyland commercial vehicles? If not, what did they discuss, and will the Secretary of State make a statement?

Mr. Morrison: I am assured by my right hon. Friend that they did not meet.

Mr. John Mark Taylor: Is my hon. Friend now reconciled to the fact that the future of Land Rover lies independently of Leyland and, one hopes, in the private sector? Will my hon. Friend encourage the new chief executive of Leyland to look at those possibilities?

Mr. Morrison: I am not reconciled to any particular facts about Land Rover, but I wish it every success in an expanding market place.

Mr. Terry Davis: If there are some doubts about jobs at Bedford, would not it be a good idea to consider the possibility of General Motors' van-making operation, which is losing money, being taken over by the the profit-making Freight Rover?

Mr. Morrison: The hon. Gentleman will recall that he and I visited the Freight Rover plant in his constituency and I hope he recalls that I was impressed by what I saw.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Will my hon. Friend accept that many of us were obliged to the Government for seeing the sense of the argument that Land Rover, as a specialist manufacturer, should stay on its own, but will he also accept that many of us believe that rationalisation of our commercial vehicle industry is important and that most of us who were against the earlier plan would welcome General Motors, through its Bedford subsidiary, having sensible talks with Leyland Truck, so that a viable and prosperous truck industry can survive and thrive in this country?

Mr. Morrison: It is a welcome exception to get a pat on the back from my hon. Friend in this area, and I am most grateful to him. I am also most interested in my hon. Friend's concern for the future of the truck industry, which, as we have been saying constantly throughout this year, is most important indeed and about which difficult decisions will have to be made.

Mr. John Smith: Since, as the Minister well knows, from August 1984 until earlier this year the Government had a strategy to dispose of our commercial vehicles industry, or large sections of it, to American interests and that has now collapsed in a shambles, what is the Government's present strategy for the industry? Can the Minister tell us whether any talks are going on or are planned with any foreign interests to acquire any part of the British motor vehicle industry?

Mr. Morrison: The right hon. and learned Gentleman has been told on several occasions that the Government's strategy is to rationalise, where that is necessary, to ensure that there is a healthy and viable commercial vehicle industry. No talks are taking place.

Competitiveness

8. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied with the competitiveness of British industry.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Paul Channon): I welcome the increase in our share of world trade in manufactures last year, and the continuing improvement in our manufacturing productivity, but I cannot be satisfied as long as unit labour costs in manufacturing industry are rising faster in the United Kingdom than in our main competitor countries.

Mr. Thurnham: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the profit-sharing proposals in the Budget should be of particular benefit to manufacturing and other companies which have to compete in world markets?

Mr. Channon: Yes, I hope that they will have some effect. I hope that those proposals, which I warmly welcome, will receive a good welcome from both sides of the House.

Mr. Evans: Does the Secretary of State ackowledge that the competitiveness of British industry would be greatly improved if it were operating on the same basic standards as those of our EEC competitors? Will the Secretary of State answer the question which his hon. Friend the Minister for Trade could not or would not answer, as to why has there been so little progress over the harmonisation of technical standards in the EEC and why it is that EEC countries can export to this country, although we cannot, apparently, export to them?

Mr. Channon: I should like to look at a specific example, because the situation varies from industry to industry. In general terms, I believe that quite a lot of progress is being made on the harmonisation of technical standards. If the hon. Gentleman is saying that it should proceed faster I agree entirely with him, but, alas, that is not entirely within our gift.

Mr. John Browne: Does my right hon. Friend accept that competitiveness depends crucially upon new products and that that in itself depends upon the birth of new and smaller businesses, which, under this Government, have never enjoyed a better environment? Does my right hon. Friend also accept that, to be truly competitive, our products must be designed properly, built with quality, delivered on time and given adequate after-sales service? Again, does he accept that under this Government the environment has never been better for encouraging competitiveness, particularly because of our firm exchange rate?

Mr. Channon: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend that the factors he has cited are crucial if British industry is to be more competitive. Immense strides have been made, but I remain worried about unit labour costs, which are extremely important and a major factor.

Mr. Haynes: When will the Secretary of State and the Government wake up to the fact that we cannot possibly compete against other nations of the world, which receive heavy financial assistance from their Governments? When will this Government stop industry floundering around and collapsing right across the nation? When will they wake up and do something about it?

Mr. Channon: Most uncharacteristically, the hon. Gentleman exaggerates his case. In fact, the prospects for British industry are extremely good. The forecast for the economy is also extremely good. I look forward with confidence to the progress of British industry during the next few months.

Mr. Holt: Will my right hon. Friend note that, however competitive the furniture industry may be, it is impossible for it now to compete with the flood of furniture that is being imported from the Eastern bloc? It is undermining a very old and well-established industry in this country. If the Government do not take action, the industry will suffer a serious decline.

Mr. Channon: If there is evidence of dumping in the furniture industry, I shall be very glad to receive it and to take appropriate action.

Mr. Gould: Does the Secretary of State accept that the most widely used index of competitiveness, the IMF index of relative normalised unit labour costs, shows a loss of competitiveness since this Government took office of no less than 30 per cent.? Will he therefore have a word with his right hon. Friends about this? His right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland is the latest culprit, after his appearance on television last Sunday. All those Ministers constantly, and wrongly, assert that competitiveness has improved under this Government. Will he give the facts to them so that they cease making false and misleading statements?

Mr. Channon: We are doing well on productivity and we are doing well in industry. The forecast for the economy is good, GDP is now entering its sixth successive year of growth and investment is at a record high. The Labour party's attempts to diminish these achievements are very misleading and undesirable.

Mr. Ashdown: Does the Minister recognise that real interest rates in Britain are still higher than in competitor nations? Is he aware that our inflation rate is still the second highest in Europe — ahead only of Italy — and that wage rates here are much higher than in competitor countries? Does he accept that unless he does something more effective — for instance, by joining the European monetary system and imposing more effective wage restraint — [Interruption.] — those three factors will continue to undermine the competitiveness of British industry?

Mr. Channon: We shall all want to study with care what the hon. Gentleman said in the last part of his question, which did not seem to meet with universal approval. I am interested in the hon. Gentleman's views on wage rates and wage restraint. I hope that we shall soon have good news about inflation. The news on inflation is becoming better and better, and long-term interest rates are at their lowest for 14 years.

Mr. Roger King: Does my right hon. Friend agree that one way to improve the further competitiveness of British industry is to remove the penal rating which many Labour authorities throughout the country are levying on British industry? According to the Birmingham chamber of commerce and industry, £55 million extra is being spent by industry and 10,000 jobs have been lost. Is it not time that we did something about the rate system?

Mr. Channon: I agree with my hon. Friend. He is right to draw our attention to the fact that high and excessive rates imposed by Labour councils can cause damage to industry throughout the country.

National Educational Resouces Information Service

9. Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what are the aims and the objectives of the national educational resources information service.

Mr. Butcher: The national educational resources information service is a computer-based service for schools. It will provide information on educational resource material directly relevant to the school curriculum and is designed to assist teachers. It is interactive and can be accessed by means of a local telephone call.

As my hon. Friend the Minister for Information Technology announced at the press briefing on 28 April, the service will be available from January 1987. It is being financed for three years by the Department of Trade and Industry.

Mr. Lawler: I thank my hon. Friend for spelling out the detail on that service, which I am sure will be welcomed by all teachers. To ensure that there is wide usage, can my hon. Friend ensure that individual teachers are told clearly how they can gain access to the information database?

Mr. Butcher: There is a considerable degree of marketing of the scheme. I know that my hon. Friend takes a close interest in the training of young people and in maximising their chances of finding employment. Provided that schools have a modem attached to their existing or new micro-computers they can gain access to the central database very easily, for the cost of a local telephone call.

British Leyland

10. Mr. Robert Atkins asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a further statement on the future of British Leyland's truck and bus divisions.

Mr. Peter Morrison: A number of possible offers for Leyland Bus are being considered by the BL board and my right hon. Friend expects to receive a recommendation shortly. The position regarding Leyland Trucks is as he announced in his statement on 25 March.

Mr. Atkins: Is my hon. Friend aware that many of my constituents will this weekend be celebrating the 90th anniversary reunion of the company's activities? What message can I give to them about the uncertainties facing the bus and truck industry so that their future may be resolved and so that I shall be present at their celebration of 100 years?

Mr. Morrison: If I was not aware as little as five years ago, I have been made perfectly aware by my hon. Friend of the importance of Leyland truck and bus divisions to his constituency. He will appreciate that both bus and truck industries are in difficulties. Difficult decisions will have to be taken. If they are taken correctly, a viable bus and truck industry will be ensured.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will the Leyland National bus plant at Workington survive?

Mr. Morrison: That depends on what recommendation the BL board makes to my right hon. Friend. I am more than aware from the hon. Member how important an industrial unit is the bus plant in Workington.

Sir Hector Monro: Will my hon. Friend bear in mind repercussions far afield from the plant at Leyland? Does he realise that an important, modern and small construction engineering plant in my constituency will be gravely at risk if the Workington plant closes? Will he do all that he can, under whatever ownership, to ensure that that plant and others continue satisfactorily into the future?

Mr. Morrison: I can assure my hon. Friend that when any decisions are made about any part of the vehicle sector, the component suppliers and the implications for their future are taken carefully into account.

Mr. Park: Does the Minister accept that the continuing uncertainty created in British Leyland by the examination and re-examination of the corporate plan must be overcome as quickly as possible? Is there not now to be another examination under the new chairman, who not only has to pass an opinion on the corporate plan, but first has to inform himself about the industry?

Mr. Morrison: On the latter point, I have every confidence in what Mr. Graham Day will do as chairman and chief executive of BL. I understand the hon. Gentleman's former point. However, he will know and appreciate that during the period of uncertainty the percentage share of the market for trucks actually went up.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim: Is my hon. Friend aware that in 1970 the BL truck division was the largest manufacturer of trucks in the world? Is he further aware that, despite recent advances, it has since declined to become the smallest of the major truck manufacturers in Europe? Therefore, is it not becoming increasingly apparent that the opposition to the Bedford-Land Rover — Leyland merger was opportunist, anachronistic and wholly ill-informed?

Mr. Morrison: My hon. Friend has put his finger somewhere near the button. I would call it political pot-stirring of the highest order.

Competition Policy

11. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received regarding competition policy.

Mr. Channon: I receive regular representations on competition policy from hon. Members and others.

Mr. Yeo: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the concern about the growing practice of companies which are the subject of competing takeover bids to collaborate, on a rather cosy basis, with the management's preferred suitor to plan a programme of asset disposals, the sole purpose of which is avoidance of a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission?

Mr. Channon. I am aware of that, and also of the public comment about it. My concern has been to make references primarily on competition grounds. That has been the case since 1984 when my right hon. Friend, now the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, announced the results of his review. I think that, in general, it is working well, but I shall certainly bear in mind my hon. Friend's point.

Mr. Flannery: Is not British industry's state of collapse because of its failure to compete due to Government policy? British Shipbuilding is in such a dilemma. Is it not true that money on a grand scale is going from this country into the coffers of our competitors? When the Japanese Government see an aspect of their industry in trouble, do not massive subventions of cash go into that industry to corner the market and flood the world with goods? This Government sit still and let our industry reach a state of collapse.

Mr. Channon: The hon. Gentleman is not expressing the facts about British industry. As I said earlier, its prospects are extremely good. That is generally recognised both inside and outside the House.

Mr. Favell: Is my right hon. Friend satisfied with the competitive position of Austin Rover, which during the first four months of this year saw its home market share drop to a disastrous 16 per cent.? Therefore, is it not time to re-open talks with Ford of Great Britain?

Mr. Channon: No, Sir, I have no plans to do that. However, I understand my hon. Friend's understandable concern about the competitive position of Austin Rover. It has good products coming along and it has made great strides, especially in Europe. I hope that hon. Members have noted the increase in percentages there. I am sure that under Mr. Graham Day and his board every effort will be made to improve the company's position still further.

Mr. Ryman: This question is about competition policy. Is the Minister really satisfied with the unsatisfactory state of affairs in a number of recent hostile takeover bids? Does he not appreciate that there is complete uncertainty about the attitude of the Director General of Fair Trading as to what bids are or are not referred? The system seems to follow no logical principle to protect the public interest. Was not the most glaring recent example the Distillers-Argyll-Guiness battle, which has baffled experts on both sides?

Mr. Channon: I make no comment on the last part of the hon. Gentleman's supplementary question. On his general point, I do not think that there is uncertainty in the market. As I have tried to explain to the House—I think that this is well understood outside — references are made primarily on competition grounds. That has been my practice during my short period in office as Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, and that was the practice of my predecessors from 1984.

Mr. Nelson: In the context of competition policy, will my right hon. Friend consider whether it is desirable that we should have a decreasing number of major joint stock banks? Does he consider it to be in the interests of borrowers, depositors and the public at large that the number should be decreasing and that such major takeovers as are currently proposed — for example, Standard Chartered Bank and Lloyds — should be allowed to go ahead in an untrammelled way?

Mr. Channon: I note what my hon. Friend says. I do not think that he will expect me to make a comment on a specific case at present, as it is a matter that I may be called upon to decide. I take note, however, of what he says.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Does the Secretary of State agree that many of the mergers that have taken place in recent times have been little to the benefit of the work force, customers or the public interest, and have been based largely on the self-aggrandisement of those who own the companies or those making the bids? Does that not illustrate the ineffectiveness of the Government's competition policy? Will he consider changing the basis of it so that those making bids have to prove the benefits that might flow from them?

Mr. Channon: I should be reluctant to make that change. I do not agree with most of what the hon. Gentleman said in his supplementary question, but I believe that there is a need for certainty and consistent policy. This is an area of policy which is difficult and needs study, and I am considering all aspects of it.

EUREKA

12. Mr. Bellingham asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what benefits he hopes to accrue to the United Kingdom from the EUREKA initiative.

Mr. Pattie: EUREKA is benefiting us both by increasing the opportunities for British firms to collaborate with European partners in developing new technology, and by focusing attention on the need for action to open up and integrate the European market.

Mr. Bellingham: In spite of the unfortunate name, may I congratulate the Government on adapting the initiative to British requirements by turning it into a market-led programme, which should create new and real jobs? Will he do all that he can to ensure that small firms, especially those in Norfolk, are able to benefit from the programme?

Mr. Pattie: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comments. The flexibility of the EUREKA framework allows projects of differing sizes, and small firms with specialist skills are well placed to participate. I am encouraged by the extent to which they have shown interest.

Mr. Dalyell: Was it not concern about the future of the EUREKA project that partly prompted the gravest doubts on the part of the then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan), which were overcome only when on Thursday 5 December at 9 am he, along with the Secretary of State for Defence, were summoned separately to No. 10 Downing street to be told that if those doubts were not overcome they could like it, lump it or go? Was that not the truth of the situation?

Mr. Pattie: I have not the faintest idea what the hon. Gentleman is talking about.

Manufactured Goods

13. Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the latest balance of trade in manufactured goods.

Mr. Alan Clark: In the first quarter of this year there was a deficit of £1·4 billion.

Mr. Canavan: How can the Government claim that their economic policies are a success when they have been responsible for the worst manufacturing trade deficit in British history? Bearing in mind that the deficit has existed continuously since the 1983 general election, will the Minister admit that we shall probably never see a manufacturing trade surplus again until this incompetent Tory Government are replaced at the next general election by a Labour Government who are committed to industrial regeneration and the growth of exports?

Mr. Clark: I am just as anxious as the hon. Gentleman to see a manufacturing trade surplus. The wealth of a nation is measured by its gross domestic product, which is composed of many different elements. The hon. Gentleman's supplementary question does less than service to our manufacturers, whose exports in 1985, both by volume and by value, were higher than ever before.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Does my hon. Friend share my alarm at the fact that the deficit in trade with the EEC in the first quarter of the year, at £2·8 billion, was the highest ever recorded and is equivalent to almost 1 million job losses? Why do we find it so difficult to make good trading arrangements with the Common Market as compared with the rest of the world?

Mr. Clark: My understanding is that the exceptionally high deficit in the first quarter of this year reflects trade in the more erratic items.

Mr. Pike: When will the Government realise that we shall never solve the country's financial problems until we get our trade in manufactured goods back into surplus? When will they realise that people in the north-west, who depend heavily on manufacturing industries, will never be got back to work unless the Government change direction and get our manufacturing industries back into surplus?

Mr. Clark: Trade in manufactures is but one element in the overall picture of trade. The overall surplus reflects revenues from oil, a surplus in services and the money from increasing manufactured goods and exports. We spend on imports of intermediate goods to fuel growth, on capital goods to invest for the future and on consumer goods to enhance freedom of choice.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Does my hon. Friend agree that his original answer was somewhat disappointing to those of us on the Tory side of the House who feel that genuine wealth is created by manufacturing industry and that it is upon manufacturing industry that service industries depend? In view of the somewhat unsatisfactory results in the by-elections and local government elections last week, will my hon. Friend prevail on our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and on Treasury Ministers to give manufacturing the emphasis and priority which it deserves, to stand up for British manufacturing industry in the arenas of the world and to provide fair rather than unfair competition?

Mr. Clark: My hon. Friend is entirely right. It is a principal objective of the Government and this Department to ensure fair conditions of trading. In fair conditions, I am confident that, provided British manufactures are competitive — much of their decline, it must be admitted, rests in that they have lost competitive quality in several respects — they will advance. As I told the hon. Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan), manufacturing exports increased by 5·5 per cent. last year.

Mr. John Smith: Is the Minister aware how serious it is that, in the first quarter of 1986, we have had a balance of trade deficit on manufactured goods as high as £1·4 billion? What do the Government intend to do to reduce our balance of trade deficit in manufactured goods, bearing in mind that, as the oil balance deteriorates, it will become a much more serious problem? Why, if the so-called erratic items were so important, was no reference made to them when the trade figures were published, or is this the hon. Gentleman taking a semi-detached view of the matter?

Mr. Clark: I do not think that it was thought necessary to make any special reference to what were only exceptional figures for one quarter.

Support for Marketing Initiative

14. Mr. Richard Page asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on his Department's Support for Marketing initiative.

Mr. Butcher: This new advisory service will be introduced by the Department later this year. It is intended to assist and encourage small and medium-sized firms to develop or improve their marketing strategies by offering financial assistance for up to 15 man days' expert consultancy in this important area of their operations.

Mr. Page: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that reply. Does he agree with the old adage which runs, "If you don't tell you don't sell"? What reassurances can he and the Government give that the new initiative will not suffer from the shortage of funds which has unfortunately affected the business and technical advisory service?

Mr. Butcher: Some of Britain's critics have sometimes said that, although we might be excellent at developing products, we are perhaps not so good at marketing them. The scheme is a response to those who requested an enhancement of training and consultancy, especially small and medium-sized companies. I understand that success has caused the problem of queues in the business and technical advisory service, especially as we have multiplied by five times the amount of money that is spent on that general scheme during the past four years. I take my hon. Friend's point. We shall act to ensure that the queues are shortened.

Companies (Political Funds)

Mr Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation that would require companies to ballot their shareholders on whether a political fund should be established to make political donations.

Mr. Channon: No, Sir.

Mr. Winnick: As the Government were so insistent that trade unions should have to ballot their members every 10 years about whether a political fund should be established or maintained, why should the same not apply to companies? Is the Minister aware that a recent MORI poll found that 82 per cent. of the people surveyed believe that companies should be treated in the same way as trade unions? Did the Minister say no simply because the bulk of the money goes from companies to the Tory party and its front organisations?

Mr Channon: No. The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that there are completely different factors relating to trade unions and companies. Shareholders have complete freedom of choice to invest their money, but many trade union members have no choice, and, even now, are forced to join a union to get a job. Moreover, we all know how misleading the trade union campaign was on political fund ballots. The two matters are not in any way analogues, and it would be wrong to legislate.

Mr. Sumberg: Is it not a fact that every company must have an annual general meeting, and that at that meeting the shareholders can accept or reject the donations? The fact that they rarely, if ever, do, proves that British industry and shareholders want a Conservative Government returned at the general election because they know that if the Opposition were returned it would be a disaster.

Mr. Channon: I agree with my hon. Friend, and I am glad that British industry shows that common sense.

British Shipbuilders

3.30 pm

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Paul Channon): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement.

As the House will know, British Shipbuilders won only 23,000 compensated gross tonnes of orders last year. This was little more than a tenth of the amount forecast in its corporate plan. This was not for lack of Government support. The financial support for individual orders is not the problem. The problem is that orders are simply not there to be won. In Sweden, for example, which a few years ago had one of the most modern merchant shipbuilding industries in the world, the entire industry is closing down. This reflects the latest downturn in the shipbuilding market, which has resulted in capacity reductions and redundancies across the world. Despite Government support of over £1,400 million since 1979 and the recent increase in the level of support for new orders, it has proved impossible for British Shipbuilders to maintain its current capacity in the absence of new orders.

British Shipbuilders has, therefore, today announced measures which deal with this over-capacity. They include a decision to close by the end of the year, Smith's Dock, the Troon shipyard of Ferguson-Ailsa, and the Wallsend site of Clark Kincaid. In addition, British Shipbuilders has, as part of its wage negotiations, proposed a two-year deal which will seek to match manpower and capacity more closely to demand. The Government regret that these necessary measures will lead to total redundancies of some 3,500 people by March 1987. British Shipbuilders hopes that a substantial number of these will be achieved by voluntary redundancy.

The Government propose to provide British Shipbuilders with immediate support of up to £5 million in the current financial year to enable it to set up a new subsidiary, British Shipbuilders Enterprise Ltd. This will provide expert and practical services for those facing redundancy. It will ensure that they have at their workplace counsellors with the skills and resources to guide them towards retraining and redeployment opportunities, and to provide financial support to take advantage of those opportunities. It will also offer financial help and advice to those wishing to take the initiative of setting up their own businesses.

In addition, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment has asked the Manpower Services Commission to provide a further £1 million specifically for the retraining of redundant employees of British Shipbuilders in direct co-operation with the new enterprise corporation. He will also make available £1 million via the City Action Team for job creation measures and to stimulate enterprise in the north-east.

The community programme is already being expanded in the north-east from its present level of 22,000 jobs to 29,000 jobs at an extra cost of some £30 million. My right hon. Friend has asked the Manpower Services Commission to explore urgently new ways in which the resources of the community programme and the enterprise allowance scheme can be used in order to lead to permanent jobs in the north-east.

In addition to these measures, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment has reviewed the derelict land reclamation and urban programmes in the areas affected—[Interruption.] I had thought that this matter was of some interest to the north-east.

At £13 million, the reclamation programme in the north-east region this year is already substantial, but it will be increased by a further £1 million. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State also proposes to allocate an extra £2 million under the urban programme, adding to the region's £35 million programme this year. British Shipbuilders Enterprise Ltd. will also operate in Scotland. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland will consider urgently additional measures to help the areas affected by the redundancies announced today.

The measures that I have outlined will be in addition to the existing regional aid programmes, including assistance via English Industrial Estates for which the areas concerned are already eligible.

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): Is the Secretary of State aware that the chilling and desperate news contained in that statement will cause not only dismay but deep anger throughout the shipbuilding areas? Is he not ashamed to come to the House to announce 3,500 redundancies? Why did he not tell us about redundancies in particular yards — [Interruption.] Conservative Members may not like it, but they will have to listen to it. Why did the Secretary of State not tell the House that there would be 495 redundancies at Govan Shipbuilders? Why did he not tell us that there would be more than 900 redundancies at Austin and Pickersgill, and Sunderland Shipbuilders? Why was that information not given to the House? Was he ashamed to give the details?

Is the Secretary of State aware that the collection of small sums which he has offered to the House in a desperate passing of the hat around Government Departments amounts to no more than putting tiny pieces of sticking plaster over gaping wounds? Is he aware that that money is just a pittance compared with the tens of millions of pounds taken away from those areas by the halving of regional development grants in the past few years? Does the right hon. Gentleman not now think that the decision to hive off and sell the naval shipyards, thus breaking up the integrated nature of the British shipbuilding industry, was, as a former chairman declared this morning, a "national disgrace"?

The Secretary of State spoke about the Government having helped, but why did they not intervene to ensure that British Nuclear Fuels plc, in whose company they were the majority shareholder, ordered the fifth nuclear carrier from British shipyards just like the previous four had been ordered, instead of allowing the order to go to Japan? Why do the Government not have a programme of bringing forward public sector orders to ensure that ships that will need to be built some day are built now, while our shipbuiding industry is still capable of building them? Why do the Government not urgently reassess the systems and packages of support so that British Shipbuilders has as good a package of support as any other shipbuilding firm in the world?

Why do the Government not set up a special task force, charged with the job of ensuring that our British shipbuilding industry survives? It is clear that in 1986

British merchant shipbuilding will either survive or disappear. On the evidence so far, the Government are completely indifferent as to which.

Mr. Channon: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is wrong on almost all points. I do not think that British shipbuilding is on the verge of disappearing. It is important that we should try to take the necessary steps to keep merchant shipbuilding going in this country. The right hon. and learned Gentleman asked about public sector orders. Some are expected soon, including a fisheries protection vessel and two small ferries for Scotland, for which both British Shipbuilders and other British private sector yards are tendering.

The House must understand that further public sector orders cannot be conjured out of thin air if there is no need for them. The right hon. and learned Gentleman is misleading the House and the country if he imagines that there is some pool of public sector orders that are desperately needed and that can easily be brought forward. That is not the case. He would also mislead the House if he were to give the impression that this is a British problem; it is a worldwide problem. If the House wants details of the redundancy figures I gave, I can simplify them, but I have already told the House the unfortunate total of redundancies.

As to our subsidies being competitive, as a whole, subsidies available to British Shipbuilders match those available elsewhere. It is quite misleading to make comparisons of the credit available without comparing direct production subsidies. It is essential that we do our best to help the industry. It is not good enough for the right hon. and learned Gentleman to misrepresent the position that exists all over the world.

Mr. Neville Trotter (Tynemouth): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is not a money problem but a worldwide problem? There is throughout a lack of shipbuilding orders caused by the calamitous state of the shipping industry worldwide. I welcome the palliatives which my right hon. Friend has announced and offer my congratulations regarding the British Shipbuilders enterprise corporation. Does my right hon. Friend accept that it is essential that this country continues to have a merchant shipping capability? We must continue to have some fundamental level of shipbuilding capability. Will my right hon. Friend confirm that we must maintain research and development facilities in British Shipbuilders, because the future lies in specialist and complicated vessels?

Mr. Channon: Yes, I agree. As my hon. Friend said in the second part of his question, it is important that facilities for research and the appropriate technology are both available. My hon. Friend said that it is a worldwide problem. I have already cited the example of Sweden. I shall cite also the example of Japan. For nearly 10 years, the Japanese have had to cut capacity. They are now considering reductions of one third in the larger yards. They have already laid off 10,000 people. To give the impression that it is solely a British problem is wholly misleading.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): Is the Minister aware that there are orders available in the world, that 13 million tons of orders were placed worldwide last year, and that we won orders for only 20,000 CGT? The orders are there and we are not getting them. [HON. MEMBERS: Why not?] Why do not the Government spend money on helping us to get orders instead of spending it to pick up the pieces of unemployment? Is the Minister aware that Govan Shipbuilders, which has suffered 500 redundancies today, is interested in orders from China for container ships and in a ferry order? However, it can get those orders only if there is a sufficient package of Government support. That is what we are asking for today.

Mr. Channon: The right hon. Gentleman's point about Chinese container ships is entirely right. We are prepared to offer the appropriate amount of mixed credit to make that possible. The House must understand that, in trying to get orders, it is not just a question of subsidy. There is a desperate shortage of orders worldwide. The United Kingdom is offering the same sort of credit as other countries offer — fully competitive packages. British Shipbuilders is doing its best to win the orders. One does it a disservice by demeaning what it is trying to do.

Mr. Tony Speller (Devon, North): I refer my right hon. Friend to the Appledore shipyard in north Devon, which is in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Sir P. Mills), who is absent today due to sickness. Workers at that shipyard live both in my hon. Friend's constituency and in my constituency of Devon, North. Although 650 workers may seem a small number, their redundancies will be a huge, catastrophic occurrence for our area. On the subject of reviewing the boundaries of regional aid and access to European funds, does my right hon. Friend agree that the time to take action is now rather than delay further while matters get worse?

Mr. Channon: I shall certainly consider what my hon. Friend has said, although the question of where the boundaries should be drawn raises difficult problems. I hope that the effect in Appledore will not be too severe.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): Does the Secretary of State accept that we are seeing a decimation of our shipbuilding industry? If it is a worldwide problem, why has the Conservative party, since it came to office in 1979, done little to work with other Governments to stimulate world trade and to increase the demand for shipping? If the industry has been facing massive problems, why have the Government deflected it from the major market, construction and manufacturing problems facing it with the re-organisation and the privatisation programme?

As for the north, especially in the Cleveland area where Smith's Dock is to be closed, will the right hon. Gentleman give an assurance, in addition to the ad hoc measures which he has mentioned, that he will support financially the proposal by the Northern CBI, the Northern TUC and others for a northern development company?

Mr. Channon: I shall of course consider the hon. Gentleman's last point. He must face up to the fact that this is a problem of the shipbuilding industry not only in Britain but all over the world. The hon. Gentleman implied that the Government had neglected shipbuilding. I have already told the House that, since 1979, there has been Government support of more than £1·4 billion. If that is neglect, I should like to know what is not.

Mr. James Tinn (Redcar): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, in the 20-odd years in which I have been a Member, I have watched with admiration the first-class work of the men and management at Smith's Dock in my constituency? Their achievements were confirmed as recently as last November in a letter from Graham Day, the then chairman of British Shipbuilders, in which he discounted rumours of future closures. Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that this announcement is a shabby return for all their sterling work? Does he agree that the ameliorative measures which have been announced amount to little more than a contribution to the funeral expenses of an important sector of the British shipbuilding industry? If reports that the Cubans are looking for four or five vessels—depending on the finance available—are correct, will the right hon. Gentleman see to it that British yards are able successfully to tender for them?

Mr. Channon: I understand and sympathise very much with the hon. Gentleman's comments. I recognise his understandable feelings at this difficult time. I do not think that any Cuban orders have yet been won. Negotiations are taking place, but I do not want to be drawn into the details. It would obviously be a great help to British Shipbuilders and yards in the United Kingdom if they won the Cuban orders. I shall certainly bear in mind the hon. Gentleman's points.

Mr. Piers Merchant (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): Does my right hon. Friend agree that this problem has been brought about not because of Government dereliction but because of the world crisis in shipbuilding—a crisis which he has faced up to with positive courage? Does my right hon. Friend agree that his package of nearly £10 million of extra aid will be widely welcomed in the north-east? Will he consider appointing a Minister to oversee the way in which that money is spent so that it does not fall into the hands of unaccountable and unelected organisations?

Mr. Channon: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's comments about the assistance that the Government hope to give in the affected areas. It is not for me to appoint a Minister to undertake that task. However, I am sure that we shall have to devise effective ways of ensuring that the money is spent in the best possible way to help in this difficult situation.

Mr. James Callaghan (Cardiff, South and Penarth): Does the Minister appreciate that many of us believe that it is an act of folly for an island—not Sweden—which imports and exports 90 per cent. of its trade to allow its shipbuilding industry to be almost destroyed? Whether or not orders are there to be won — the right hon. Gentleman says that they are not and, of course, we must accept that — do the Government believe that it is essential to preserve a viable shipbuilding industry of considerable size? If it is necessary to adopt a scrap-and-build policy, as was done earlier, to meet the needs of a temporary problem, why not do that? What are the right hon. Gentleman's comments on the national position of our shipbuilding industry?

Mr. Channon: I understand, and to some extent share, the right hon. Gentleman's view. It is extremely important that we have a merchant shipbuilding industry. I think that the right hon. Gentleman will pay me credit for trying to achieve a situation in which the industry is viable.

I am afraid that if British Shipbuilders keeps everything open the industry's financial position will worsen, not improve.

I believe that the merchant shipbuilding industry is in a position to survive and will survive. I do not believe that the scrap-and-build process that the right hon. Gentleman has advocated was a success, but obviously we are considering every step that can be taken.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): Does my right hon. Friend agree that this lack of orders has caused a serious situation in Scotland, especially at Govan Shipbuilders and the Ferguson-Ailsa yard at Troon? Will he say a little more about how the British Shipbuilders enterprise corporation money will be shared out? Will there be adequate allocations for Scotland? Will there be discussions with the Scottish Development Agency, taking into account the successful work of the British steel industry in similar circumstances, which has brought many valuable jobs to the west of Scotland?

Mr. Channon: I think that I can give all those assurances to my hon. Friend. The British Shipbuilders enterprise corporation will operate in Scotland. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland is considering additional measures, and I shall ensure that everything that my hon. Friend has said is drawn to his attention.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): Does the Secretary of State accept that the House will be perplexed that not one of the new initiatives announced today will save shipbuilding jobs? Does he accept that merchant shipbuilding is on the point of collapse? If so, what new measures does he intend to announce today?

Mr. Channon: I do not accept that it is on the verge of collapse. It is an extremely difficult situation, which is why these measures have to be taken. Further yards remain, and I very much hope that they will survive.

Sir David Price (Eastleigh): Does my right hon. Friend accept that his depressing statement is a logical consequence of the very rapid decline in the British merchant fleet, about which the Government have been warned consistently from both sides of the House, especially by my right hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann) and myself? Even at this late hour, will my right hon. Friend and the Government take some of the measures taken by other countries to support their merchant navies? If we support the merchant navy we may get some orders for our shipbuilders.

Mr. Channon: I certainly take note of my hon. Friend's point. I shall discuss it with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): Does the Secretary of State realise that what he has just announced means 3,500 highly skilled men going on the streets? A few community jobs and derelict land schemes will not save the valuable skills of this maritime nation. When will the Minister take some notice of what has been said by the Oppositon since 1979 about the decline in merchant shipping and the British shipbuilding industry? When will he come forward with something constructive? What he has announced today will do nothing for the British shipbuilding industry.

Mr. Channon: I have been trying to announce steps that will help the difficult position faced by the House and the shipbuilding industry. It is a serious situation, as the hon. Gentleman knows better than anybody. He also knows better than anybody that the problems facing the shipbuilding industry are worldwide and not confined to Britain. Such problems are faced by many countries and they have taken similar steps. It is foolish, misleading and unfair to suggest that we could take steps to get out of this position when other countries have not been able to.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): Although I accept that today's announcement is the accumulation of years of neglect and the lack of orders, does my right hon. Friend accept that the closure of Smith's Dock in Langbaurgh, with the current high level of unemployment, will be much worse than anywhere else in the country? Therefore, will he take whatever steps he can, and say whether the £5 million he has announced is a limited figure or whether, once that has been used, further moneys will be made available? What steps will be taken to assist those people who would like to relocate to areas where work is available from an area where the house prices are the lowest in the country? Any form of help will be most welcome to my constituents.

Mr. Channon: I understand my hon. Friend's views. I hope that the amount of money announced today will be sufficient, but, of course, we shall keep the matter continually under review.

Mr. David Lambie (Cunninghame, South): Is the Minister aware that the decision by British Shipbuilders to close the Ferguson-Ailsa yard at Troon, making 350 people redundant in this already high unemployment black spot, will increase male unemployment to nearly 40 per cent. and will put the final nail in the political coffin of the Secretary of State for Defence, who represents that area? Will the Minister consult the Secretary of State for Scotland to see whether the present orders for two ferries for the Scottish sea routes and one replacement vessel for the fisheries protection fleet that the Minister spoke of today can be directed to Ferguson-Ailsa in order to keep the yard open and ensure the future of the Port Glasgow and Troon shipyards?

Mr. Channon: I shall not comment on what the hon. Gentleman said in the first half of his question. As to the second half, the orders will have to go out to tender and competition in the normal way. A great many yards would like to have those orders.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): As shipbuilding is a cyclical industry, will the Minister take steps to preserve the facilities at Smith's Dock and Ferguson-Ailsa for a possible recovery? Can he understand the feelings of those who work in shipbuilding, as I did before coming to the House, who are just a bit sick when we see that the total amount of cash provided for next year is equivalent to what we are paying every four days to subsidise agriculture and produce items that nobody wants because there is acute world over-capacity?

Mr. Channon: That may well be so, but surely my hon. Friend agrees that this is not so much a cash as an orders problem. There is a lack of orders for ships all over the world, including this country. That is well understood.

Mr. Taylor: Who wants to buy agriculture?

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend talks about this being a cyclical industry. All the forecasts that I have seen remain extremely gloomy about the industry for a long time.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): In the light of the decision to close the Troon yard of Ferguson-Ailsa, may I point out to the Secretary of State that it is absolutely crucial that the fisheries protection vessel to be ordered by the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland and the Caledonian MacBrayne passenger ferry come to Ferguson-Ailsa in Port Glasgow, or the firm will disappear altogether? Has the right hon. Gentleman's Department informed the Associated Container Line that assistance can be obtained for the enlargement of its four vessels by way of the home credit scheme? There are orders there if the right hon. Gentleman's Department gets to its feet and helps British Shipbuilders to look for them.

Mr. Channon: On the hon. Gentleman's final point, that is well known, but I shall have to have that matter specially looked at. On his first point about the fisheries protection vessel and the ferries, it will be extremely important which yards those orders go to. British Shipbuilders and other yards are tendering for them now. I think that the only fair thing is for them to go out to tender in the normal way.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): Is it not the depressing reality that there are too many modern ships chasing too little cargo and that, consequently, freight rates are at an historic low? That means that there is too little money to invest in new ships and too little incentive to do so. Is my right hon. Friend aware that many ships that are being built now will be laid up as soon as they emerge from the yards?

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend shows graphically the real problems that face shipping and the shipbuilding industry—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must say to the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) that none of what he is saying is going into Hansard, so it does not help us.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): Why did the Secretary of State fail to announce in his statement any support for the present shipbuilding industry? Is he aware that it would take four Nissans in the north-east of England to make up for the shortfall of jobs that he announced today? Why cannot our community have the protection that the Government seem so willing to afford Harland and Wolff in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Channon: The hon. Gentleman is being unfair. I have said that there has been Government support of more than £1,400 million since 1979. The problem now is a lack of orders all over the world. In that difficult situation, I hope that the package that I have announced will create jobs, and be of help in the north-east and in Scotland.

Mr. Ralph Howell (Norfolk, North): Is my right hon. Friend aware that public expenditure in South Korea accounts for 20 per cent. of GDP and that in this country it is 45 per cent.? South Korea has a thriving shipbuilding industry while ours is in a shambles. Will my right hon. Friend make that point to those of his right hon. Friends who want to increase public expenditure?

Mr. Channon: Yes, I will certainly make that point to my right hon. and hon. Friends. My hon. Friend must also be aware that the Korean industry is by no means in as good a shape as it was.

Mr. Robert C. Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): Is the Minister aware that it is not true to say that there are no orders? The problem lies in the fact that for every 700,000 tonnes of world orders last year, the British industry received only 1,000 tonnes. There must be a message in that for the Minister who is responsible for the industry. The right hon. Gentleman has been less than truthful with the House and has told only half the truth. He has not mentioned the other half of the British shipbuilding industry, which is in private hands. He did not mention, for instance, that the 3,500 job losses that he has announced today will be further increased by 2,000 losses when Swan Hunter announces redundancies on the Tyne as a direct result of the Government's failure to give a shipbuilding order.

The former hon. Member for Tynemouth, the late Dame Irene Ward, must be turning in her grave after hearing the contribution of her successor today. Like her successor, the hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter), we can also afford to ignore the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, Central (Mr. Merchant) because he will be a goner at the next election.

Mr. Channon: I think that the House will know that special steps have been taken in an attempt to help Swan Hunter in relation to the auxiliary oiler replenishment vessel. I am acutely aware of the problem faced by Swan Hunter. Of course, there are some orders available, and the hon. Gentleman was correct about that. However, there are many fewer orders than there were, and I believe that every shipbuilding industry in the world is cutting back.

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): Does my right hon. Friend accept that I know that he and the House regret the necessity of having to make this statement? Does he have any idea how much money would be needed, in addition to the £1·5 billion already given, to secure the shrinking world orders that are available? Is he also aware that National Coal Board (Enterprise) Ltd., which was so denigrated by the Opposition, has created thousands of jobs and would he agree that British Shipbuilders Enterprise Ltd. will do the same?

Mr. Channon: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. The coal and steel enterprise companies have created thousands of jobs and I very much hope that British Shipbuilders Enterprise Ltd. will receive a welcome from both sides of the House and will be successful. I suspect, as I have told the House, that it is not a question of money, Government support or more subsidy. Such assistance would make little difference to British shipbuilders. There are very few orders available and those that are will not be given away. The House is misleading itself if it imagines that there is a simple solution.

Mr. Bob Clay (Sunderland, North): Is the Minister aware that workers at Austin and Pickersgill, the Sunderland shipbuilders, will take it as a sign of the Minister's indifference to their position that he could not be bothered to mention in his statement the 925 redundancies that were announced in Newcastle this morning? Is it not true that, unless the Minister changes his careless and complacent attitude, he will be back before the summer recess to announce that another one third of the industry has gone under? Is it not also true that the whole industry will disappear by the end of this year or early next year? Does the Minister accept that it is not true that there are no orders? Hon. Members have referred to orders from China and Cuba, and Yugoslavia is tendering for 23 ships abroad. Is Britain incapable of getting even five or six of these ships? It would appear that we are incapable under this Government. Will the Minister not tear up the appalling and shameful statement and get off his backside and do what Opposition Members have for long enough requested him to do?

Mr. Channon: I have already explained the position in relation to the China and Cuba orders. We are doing our utmost to win them, and the Government are helping to the maximum extent—[HON. MEMBERS: "What is the right hon. Gentleman doing?"] We are helping through the aid and trade provisions in terms of the China order, and talks are continuing about the Cuban orders.

On the hon. Gentleman's specific point about Sunderland, the figure that the hon. Gentleman referred to was included in the total number of redundancies that I announced in my statement.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): Is my right hon. Friend aware that only a year or two ago—in the lifetime of this and the previous Administration—manufacturing industry was going out at a rate of knots? There is now an upturn in the demand for manufacturing goods and we do not have the capacity to provide for the market. Will my right hon. Friend therefore accept that I am more optimistic than he that in a year or two from now there might be a demand for shipping if world trade improves? Will he ensure that he keeps some of the units available and does not close them altogether so that they can be used again when there is an increase in shipping demand?

Mr. Channon: In general, my hon. Friend is right about the opportunities and prospects for British industry in the coming year. Some industries are still facing serious problems, and the shipbuilding industry is perhaps suffering most. I wish I could be as optimistic as my hon. Friend about the prospects for the shipbuilding industry worldwide, but I will certainly consider his remarks.

Mr. Robert Litherland (Manchester, Central): Does the Minister agree with the former chairman of British Shipbuilders that the position now is so serious that the Prime Minister should intervene? Will she do that?

Mr. Channon: I heard what the former chairman said, but I agreed with very little of it.

Mr. Charles Wardle (Bexhill and Battle): Did my right hon. Friend see a report that was published last month which revealed that there is surplus capacity worldwide of 60 million tonnes in the bulk carrier market and 100 million tonnes in the tanker market? Against such a background is it any wonder that there is no demand for new ships?

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend is quite right and the House must consider the points that he made. There is a worldwide problem and it would be foolish to imagine that any Government can take steps in isolation to cure the problem. If the Opposition were responsible, they would not take the line that they are adopting now.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): Does the Secretary of State really believe that the Government's dogmatic obsession with reorganisation and privatisation has been helpful to the shipbuilding industry? At such a critical time the Government should have been concentrating their efforts on marketing and chasing orders. Rather than coming to the House to announce a rather puny welfare package, does the Secretary of State not accept that the communities in the north-east and in Scotland are looking for a package for industrial regeneration?

Mr. Channon: I do not agree that the privatisation of the warship yards has had an effect on the position. The orders required by both sets of yards are quite different. That is not to say that there are not serious problems in warship yards as well.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): When my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan) raised the question of scrap and build, the Minister said that he had some sympathy with that. If so, will he consider orders for the four much-needed ocean survey ships which will be successors to the clapped out Heckla and Hecate? Will he consider successors to the Uganda? The Uganda was used during the Falklands war, and there is now no educational cruise ship available. Would it not be sensible to consider a viable scheme involving educational cruise ships? Such a scheme worked properly until the Uganda was taken over to be used as a hospital ship. If the need ever rose again, where would we find a hospital ship for an operation similar to the Falklands campaign?

Mr. Channon: I have some sympathy with the remarks of the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan), although he was not referring specifically to scrap and build. Ship scrapping was tried in the 1930s and I, like most people, believe that that scheme was not a success. It is unlikely that it would be a success in the present climate.

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): The Minister has referred to a worldwide shortage of orders. What steps, if any, have he or the Government taken to influence orders and so stop them from going abroad? Is he aware, for example, that P and O placed a mammoth order with Norway quite recently, which should have gone to British Shipbuilders? If he is destroying the British shipbuilding industry today—and that will be greeted with horror and disgust in the north-east—what will happen if there is a worldwide revival of the industry and the work-force has been broken up and the yards have been closed?

Mr. Channon: On the specific point which the hon. Gentleman raised about getting British shipowners to buy in British yards, our recent record is similar to that of most other European countries. I have examined the figures and they are more or less the same for all the countries concerned. It is in the interests of British shipowners to place orders in British yards if the terms are right. In the case of P and O, a ship is being built at the present time.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): In relation to the Secretary of State's last statement, will he accept that all the statements that Labour Members have show that we have the worst record in the EEC on placing orders for ships in domestic yards? Will he also note that in the House today anger turns to sadness and sadness turns to shame at his exposition of our shipbuilding industry and what the Government propose to do about it? He has not referred to the 1,350 jobs at Smith's Dock. He has not said that the £1,400 million was essentially to cover deficits and was not new investment, and that it went to the naval industry as well as the merchant yards. He has not said a word in praise of the shipyard workers in Smith's Dock who have rendered a signal service to our local economy and have delivered on time ships of the highest quality. He has mentioned Cuba and China, but he has not said whether, if those orders transpire, the yards that he has mentioned today for closure will stay open. Will he now give the House the commitment that, if those orders transpire between now and the end of the year those yards, including Smith's Dock, will stay open?

Mr. Channon: If an adequate number of orders can be found to keep those yards open, that will be highly desirable and something that I would welcome. But it would be wrong of me and misleading to those concerned if I were to stand at this Dispatch Box this afternoon and say I thought that that was at all likely. That would be raising false hopes, and I would be misleading people. That would not be doing them a service. Only about a third of the orders by British shipowners have been placed outside the United Kingdom, and that is about the average for the rest of Europe.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): Is the Secretary of State aware that his response to the constructive proposals put by my right hon. and hon. Friends displays a lack of willingness to try to rescue the difficult situation in British Shipbuilders? Why, when Ministers come to the Dispatch Box and willingly put thousands of people on the scrapheap of unemployment, do they always look for the worst example in the world, in this case Sweden, and seek to emulate that worst example? Have the Conservative Government now lost any willingness to try to do just a little bit better than the worst for the people of Britain? Does the Minister realise that the Government established BSC (Industry) Ltd because they decimated the British steel industry, that they established NCB (Enterprise) Ltd. because they decimated the coal industry, and that they will now establish British Shipbuilders Enterprise Ltd. because they are decimating British shipbuilding?

Mr. Channon: The hon. Gentleman is being unfair. I have already told the House of the Government's support of £1,400 million since 1979. It is unreasonable for the hon. Gentleman not to accept that and to say that the Government have not supported the industry. He says that I have quoted only the Swedish industry. I give him the example of the Dutch, the Japanese, the Koreans, the Germans and the French whose industries are also cutting back, some in a major way.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Southampton, Itchen): What has been achieved since 1979 by spending £1,400 million of taxpayers' money other than to delay the evil and sad day that we are now experiencing?

Mr. Channon: It was right to spend that money and to support British Shipbuilders in the way that I have described. The situation that I have described today is unavoidable and is happening in many other countries.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Has not the Minister got a cheek to talk about shipbuilding being viable when in the past few years the Government have had double standards about viability in parts of the British economy? Why, if everything is tested by viability, was Johnson Matthey bank provided with £100 million of taxpayers' money in 1984 even though it was bankrupt and had run out of reserves? Why cannot shipbuilders' families be treated in the same way as people in the casino economy? What about the viability of the Common Market, which received £250 million of British taxpayers' money because it went bankrupt last year? What about the Export Credits Guarantee Department. Last year, £250 million went down the Swanee and the Government bailed it out? That was not viable. Is the House of Lords viable? Is this place viable? [HON MEMBERS: "Are you viable?"] It seems to me that the Government are concerned only with their own people. They would rather throw people on the scrap heap —the dole queue—than keep them in jobs. It is like the fellow in Bolsover told me the other day—this Minister is educated beyond his intelligence. Come on, answer.

Mr. John Smith: Does the Secretary of State realise that through all the wearisome recital of platitudes and ministerial hand-wringing to which we have been subjected this afternoon, he did not announce one new initiative to help the British shipbuilding industry to survive? Does he realise that the cost to the taxpayer of the unemployment that has been announced, with a spin-off in other industries, will probably amount to £80 million a year? Should not that be taken into account in assessing the public expenditure consequences? Those people in the industry who have not been subject to redundancy announcements today desperately need reassurance. Can he tell us that he will not be back at that Dispatch Box before the end of 1986 announcing more redundancies if he is so confident that merchant shipbuilding is not at stake?

Mr. Channon: The future of merchant shipbuilding in this and every other country will be determined by the orders that are won and the work that can be found. British shipbuilders and the Government will try to ensure that they are. No one can be sure that that will happen, but that is our aim. Indeed, as the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) said when he had responsibility for this industry,

> "Shipbuilding industries all over the world from Japan to Sweden are accepting the inevitability of contraction, and Britain cannot be insulated from this world trend."—[Official Report, 24 February 1977; Vol. 926, c. 1653]

That is the truth of the matter and it is hypocritical to pretend otherwise.

Hon. Members: Resign.

Mr. Speaker: Mrs. Lynda Chalker.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is to do with these exchanges, Sir. Will you promise to reprimand me on future occasions, as you have recently reprimanded that dreadful and persistent drip, the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), because if you were to do that, that would ensure that my frequently more witty observations would be engraved on those tablets of stone, the Official Report?

Mr. Speaker: The words which go into Hansard are those spoken when a Member is called to speak by the Chair, not those made from a sedentary position.

Mr. Faulds rose——

Mr. Speaker: I shall do what the hon. Gentleman originally asked.

Mr. Faulds: But further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. It was you who changed the ruling. In the very old days when I first came into the House witty interventions from a sedentary position were recorded in the Official Report, and it frequently lightened the exchanges.

Mr. Speaker: Maybe, if they were witty.

Foreign Affairs Council

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement about the meeting of the Foreign Affairs Council, which took place in Brussels on 12 and 13 May 1986. I represented the United Kingdom.

As a precautionary measure following the Chernobyl disaster, the Council agreed a Commission proposal for a regulation to ban the import of certain foodstuffs from the USSR, Poland, Bulgaria, Romania, Hungary, Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia. The ban entered into force on 13 May and will last until 31 May. It will be reviewed on 20 May, taking account of the latest scientific evidence. In addition, member states have undertaken to set contamination standards for intra-Community imports which are no higher than those for domestic produce, to limit the contamination level in exports to other member states to that acceptable to the recipient state, and to lift national controls on imports.

The Council discussed Community strategy in preparation for the launch of a new GATT round of trade negotiations.

The Council discussed improvements to the Community's mandate for negotiations with Mediterranean third countries on the adaptation of their co-operation and association agreements following the accession of Spain and Portugal. There will be further discussion at the June Council.

The Council reviewed the steps being taken to normalise the Community's relations with Turkey in preparation for a meeting of the Association Council which is expected to take place in the early autumn.

The text of a joint declaration by the Council, member states, Commission and Parliament against racism and xenophobia was agreed.

The Council also had a further general discussion of the current budgetary situation in the Community during which the Commission outlined its plans for a 1986 supplementary budget and the 1987 preliminary draft budget.

An Association Council with Malta was held in the margins of the Council. The operation of the EC-Malta association agreement and the possible implications for Malta of the enlargement of the Community were discussed.

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): The most important part of the Minister's statement related to the constraints placed on trade from eastern European countries. She did not enlighten the House much on that important subject. It seems that this whole shambolic pantomime has had far more to do with safeguarding the agriculture of certain European Community countries than with protecting our citizens from food contaminated by radioactivitiy.

The way in which the provisional ban—it is no more than a provisional ban—has been arrived at gives us and the British people no great confidence in the capacity of the Community to take action to deal with such emergencies. In any event, will not the existing shambles be made even worse by today's meeting of experts if it produces suggested safe radiation levels which some countries are almost bound not to accept?

The European Council has assuredly failed to reassure worried people who have watched naked commercial interests put before agreed safe standards. In addition, we have undermined our relations with eastern European countries whose produce, alone of that of all the nations over which the Chernobyl cloud has moved, is to be affected. Can we be reassured that any future action on imported foodstuff will be directly related to the risk of contamination and less related to public relations exercises in reassurance and national commercial protection?

Will the Minister tell us what advice the World Health Organisation gave on a wholesale, seven-nation ban? Finally, will she accept that the initial, unforgiveable secrecy of the Soviet authorities must not be used as an excuse for Communist-bashing by any members of the European Community, as the most vivid lesson of the disaster is that we need closer relations within Europe as a whole and not a dogfight?

Mrs. Chalker: The measures that the United Kingdom has taken since 2 May affected all incoming produce from the Soviet Union and Poland. Our measures were already in existence and, as one item in a series of items at the Foreign Affairs Council, we agreed that there should be standards that should be regularly reviewed. The hon. Gentleman says that confidence is undermined because this process has taken time, but it is bound to take time. However, the United Kingdom Government have made it absolutely clear, right from the beginning, that our citizens were protected in relation to produce coming into this country. It must be right regularly to review a situation when that situation is developing. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not pour scorn on that in future, as he has today.

Of course we abhor the secrecy over this matter, which has made it more difficult for countries to take the decisions that they wish to take. Every country in the 12 has taken its own measures and we have come together in the decisions that I have referred to and which have been mentioned in the papers for some days. I believe that not only the British people but others in the European Community can have confidence in all the checks that are going on in all member countries, and of which the institutions concerned with these matters are fully aware.

Sir Bernard Braine (Castle Point): While I fully accept the good sense of the British Government's stand, is not there an underlying anxiety, which was expressed by the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) and which some of us share? Having attended the gathering, does my hon. Friend detect any new resolution among European Governments to move more in step? For example, why is aid given unconditionally by European Governments to some countries that continue to violate basic human rights? Is there yet any realisation of the poor impression that European Governments other than our own gave to the world by not facing up to Libyan terrorism and thus forcing the Americans to take action on their own part?

Mrs. Chalker: I assure my right hon. Friend that there is a definite resolution among all member countries of the 12 not only to allay anxieties, but, more than that, to make sure that there are measures in force in each country to test produce to make sure that it does not reach the markets of those countries.

[Mrs. Chalker]

There was no lengthy debate on human rights. There was an agreement on racism which follows exactly the policy in force in this country.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): What does it mean?

Mrs. Chalker: It follows our own policy in exactly the way that I think my hon. Friends would, in the past, have probably accepted. It is not a legally binding declaration, but it reflects existing policy, which condemns all forms of discrimination on racial grounds.

I should add to my right hon. Friend the member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine) that we did not have a full discussion about Libya. There were discussions in the margins, but they were not on the agenda.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): Was there any discussion about the impact of the Chernobyl disaster on European Community stocks of food? As the Ukraine produces 20 per cent. of USSR agricultural production, is the Community ready to assist the Russians?

The Minister's statement refers to a supplementary budget. Will that match the estimates of Agra Europe, that it might reach 1·5 billion ecu in the current year?

Mrs. Chalker: If the USSR seeks to buy cereals on the world market from stocks, that will be dealt with in the normal way. The proposed supplementary budget is within the 1·4 per cent ceiling. It will include the further 500 million ecu for the British 1985 abatement and it will certainly not go as high as the hon. Gentleman suggested. It will be kept within the strict budgetary guidelines to which we have always sought to adhere.

Sir Anthony Kershaw (Stroud): Is it not surprising to hear the risk of contamination being taken so lightly in the House? Is it not entirely because of the lack of information from the Soviet Union and eastern Europe that we have been compelled to take steps that may or may not be necessary, but which have to be taken as a precaution?

Mrs. Chalker: Indeed. My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Contamination, whether of food or of the ground, is a most serious matter. The 12 members of the European Community and the countries in eastern Europe now seem conscious of the need to share information at the earliest possible opportunity. That has been one of the outcomes of the discussions that we have had. The International Atomic Energy Agency will be co-ordinating the gathering of information from whatever source. I welcome the Soviet agreement to provide the IAEA with reports on radiation levels. That will enable us to have fuller discussions at earlier dates. The IAEA board of governors will be meeting next week to discuss the matter.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): Does the hon. Lady believe that the single sentence in her statement about the budgetary problems faced by the Community is sufficient information for the House? Is the Community facing bankruptcy, as many people believe? Is there a crisis on the way? If so, should not the House know now rather than later?

Mrs. Chalker: As the budget has not yet been presented to the Council of Ministers, there was no substantive discussion of it. That is why I have no substantive discussion to report on. It is quite clear that we have already done well to secure the price cuts that were agreed in April by the Agriculture Council. They would not have been secured without budgetary discipline. We shall continue with that discipline to ensure that we reach the kind of solution for a reduction of surpluses that this country and the rest of the Community seek.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne) rose——

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): No supplementary budget?

Mr. Gow: What contribution was made by Her Majesty's Government to the discussion about a declaration against racism and xenophobia? Will my hon. Friend enlighten the House about the advantages that will accrue to mankind as a result of the discussions that took place?

Mrs. Chalker: Once more I have to say to my hon. Friend that the discussion followed the discussion by us of our existing policy and, indeed, the discussion in many other countries. I have already said that it was a combination of all our views to condemn all forms of discrimination on racial grounds. It is a moral and political undertaking. It is not legally binding.

Mr. Budgen: An undertaking—ah!

Mrs. Chalker: But it has been made available to the House. Three months ago my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Home Office, placed an explanatory memorandum in the Library of the House. That will provide my hon. Friend with all the details. There was no substantive discussion.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): On the situation in Turkey, are Her Majesty's Government and the Council of Ministers satisfied about the progress towards human rights and democracy in that country and about the trials there of trade union leaders and peace activists?

Mrs. Chalker: These matters were very much to the fore in the discussions that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister had with the Prime Minister of Turkey. The same line has been taken in the discussions within the European Community. Some Opposition Members seem to enjoy refusing to acknowledge that progress is being made. That does nothing to promote human rights. If the progress that is being made were to be welcomed, we would encourage countries that do not observe the human rights standards that we wish to see to do even more. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will do that.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Is it not unfortunate that an announcement about another massive Common Market overspend has been made on the same day as the announcement of the closure of a third of our shipbuilding industry, because there is not money with which to build ships? On the containment of radioactive food from east Europe, has my hon. Friend the Minister found the answer to a question that has been asked several times since last Thursday: how do we distinguish a Polish pig from an East German pig if both of them are shipped through Leipzig, which is not covered by the new restrictions?

Mrs. Chalker: My hon. Friend might have had a chance during the earlier statement to ask his question about shipbuilding. But it is not simply a question of overcapacity in shipbuilding throughout the world.

Mr. Taylor: Just like farming.

Mrs. Chalker: I say to my hon. Friend that the money which in his view should be spent on ships should certainly not be spent on further surpluses.

Mr. Taylor: It is being spent on surpluses.

Mrs. Chalker: My hon. Friend knows full well that every measure that we can take is being taken to reduce surpluses. On his question about East German pigs or Polish pigs, he knows that imports of such material are covered by the agreement.

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): Why was East Germany left out of the ban? That struck most British people as being very odd indeed. Can the Minister answer a question that I was asked at my surgery last Saturday? Why have the British Government banned the import of foodstuffs from Eastern bloc countries, although they have informed British citizens that they are free to travel on holiday and business to those areas, where they will surely be eating those very same foodstuffs?

Mrs. Chalker: East Germany is beyond the 1,000-km limit that was drawn, but the West German Government have undertaken that any of the produce coming from East Germany will be fully tested under their system of monitoring.

Mr. Budgen: May I thank my hon. Friend for her important and detailed statement about racism? Will she please reassure the friends of the EEC that her statement was not mere vacuous posturing and that the British Government will be pressing all the nation states of the EEC to introduce immediately into their national Parliaments legislation that is analogous to the much-respected race relations legislation in this country?

Mrs. Chalker: I suggest to my hon. Friend that if he looked at the legislation that is on the statute books of other countries, he would find that the member states of the European Community could not have agreed to this declaration unless that policy was already on their statute books.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Bearing in mind the relations that the Foreign Affairs Council has with other European countries, were the Foreign Ministers aware of the continuing concern that such a deeply stained individual as Kurt Waldheim might be elected President of Austria? Although this is a matter for the people of Austria, there are, nevertheless, few people who now believe that he told the truth about his wartime role. Clearly he knew full well what was going on and that the German army and the Nazis were involved in killings and deportations.

Mrs. Chalker: Although I know that it has become commonplace to try to attribute every ill in the world to the European Community, I have to tell the hon. Gentleman that the Foreign Affairs Council did not discuss the matter that he has raised.

Viscount Cranborne (Dorset, South): Would my hon. Friend be kind enough to tell the House how the EEC defines xenophobia? For the benefit of my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) is she able to tell the House what penalties the EEC and this Parliament will impose if anybody transgresses and becomes xenophobic under the definition established by Brussels?

Mrs. Chalker: I have already said that this is not a legally binding declaration.

Mr. Budgen: What is the point of having it, then?

Mrs. Chalker: It reflects existing policy in this country I should have thought that my hon. Friend would have had the——

Mr. Evans: Decency?

Mrs. Chalker: Maybe that is the word. I should have thought that my hon. Friend would have had the "whatever" to realise that discrimination on racial grounds will not lead to progress for anybody in this country or anywhere else in the world.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): May I put a very precise, factual, informed question to the Minister? Although she may be unable to answer it at once, I am sure that she will be able to get information from the Box and answer it later. At what time, on what day, some two or three days before the announcement and news came from Sweden, did a telephone call come through from Russia to a British member of the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna asking for advice about how to deal with graphite fires? Precisely what was the Russian request and in what terms was it phrased? I do not say that it mentioned Chernobyl, Minsk or Kiev, but what, precisely, was the question? What were they asking for? Did the British official of the International Atomic Energy Agency take any steps to let the members of the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority know? And did members of the Atomic Energy Authority——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Did all this go on at the Foreign Affairs Council?

Mr. Dalyell: The Minister raised the question of what happened, and I am asking a very precise question. Was the IAEA informed? Did the IAEA inform the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority and were Ministers informed? The Minister knows perfectly well that——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Gentleman has done jolly well. It would make an excellent Adjournment debate.

Mrs. Chalker: I shall read the Official Report with great care. I shall look into the matters that the hon. Gentleman has raised and try to unravel what is going on.

Mr. Colin Moynihan (Lewisham, East): Will my hon. Friend confirm whether there were any discussions at the meeting of the Foreign Affairs Council regarding the International Atomic Energy Agency and, if so, what was the outcome of those discussions?

Mrs. Chalker: Indeed, the International Atomic Energy Agency was discussed briefly because we were able to welcome the Soviet agreement to provide reports on radiation levels to the IAEA. We also welcomed the concerted effort by the IAEA not only to gather the information but to identify further needs for data and to disseminate that information to all interested parties—a crucial establishment of the facts against which further measures should be judged.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Will the hon. Lady propose to the British ambassador in Russia and to her colleagues in Europe that their ambassadors in Moscow should attend the funerals of those who have died at Chernobyl and of those who will die from the effects of the Chernobyl disaster because, but for the grace of God, there go all of us?

Mrs. Chalker: I think that the hon. Gentleman exaggerates a little. We have total sympathy with the relatives of all those affected by the disaster, but I fear that the location of those funerals will not be made known to foreign embassies, so the suggestion may not be possible to implement. Certainly, the suggestion will be considered.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Did the Foreign Affairs Council discuss the ludicrous idea that members of the European Assembly should be granted immunity from arrest and prosecution? Is that perhaps because they are xenophobic? Secondly, I am chairman of the British-Malta parliamentary group, so can my hon. Friend inform the House what is happening about Malta in view of the enlargement of the EEC?

Mrs. Chalker: On my hon. Friend's first question, I do not think that we can take that issue much further this afternoon. On his second question, we are talking about the Association Council in the margins. We had a discussion informally, and then a little more formally, about security in the Mediterranean, but there was no question of coming to any decisions. Discussions with Malta will continue about its associaton with the European Community. Nothing substantive was decided.

Mr. James Lamond (Oldham, Central and Royton): What about the important question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) concerning what is to happen to those people who journey beyond the Iron Curtain, such as the important IPU delegation? Fourteen members of the House, led by the Deputy Prime Minister, no less, will no doubt be eating and drinking their fill of the food that is not allowed into this country. Is there not something rather illogical about that?

Mrs. Chalker: When an IPU delegation is on its way, I am sure that it carefully considers where it is going, what it is going to do, and what it will eat and drink. I am certain that, as the delegation is going to Moscow, the Soviet authorities will take good care of the hon. Gentleman and ensure that nothing goes near his lips that will be injurious to him.

Mr. George Robertson: I asked the Minister a question earlier which she did not answer. What was the advice given by the World Health Organisation about the need for a wholesale ban on the produce of seven nations?

Mrs. Chalker: A wholesale ban on the produce of seven nations was not the advice given and it was certainly not the advice accepted by the national experts, who are also meeting in Brussels on Monday. I shall look again at what the hon. Gentleman says so that it comes up at the review meeting if that is necessary.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. When officials know perfectly well the answer to a question asked by an hon. Member, should there not be some mechanism by which the Minister can answer, even if she does not know the answer immediately? Should not the Minister be able at least to make a statement at the end of Question Time? All that I ask for——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have a heavy day ahead of us and the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) asked a question which was rather long. I have no doubt that he will receive the answers for which he asks. There are many other ways of asking such questions.

Shipbuilding Industry

4.43 pm

Mr. John Smith (Monklands, East): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter which should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the crisis in the merchant shipbuilding industry."

I shall be brief, but I hope that my brevity will not lead the House to think that there is any lack of seriousness in my application.

The matter is specific because this afternoon we heard the proposal to close three shipyards and to make 3,500 workers in the shipbuilding industry redundant. The matter could hardly be more specific for those most directly affected.

The matter is important because, as was made clear in our exchanges when questioning the Secretary of State, the whole future of the British merchant shipbuilding industry may be at stake. It is difficult, if not impossible, to underestimate the significance of this afternoon's statement and the matters to which it relates.

The issue requires urgent consideration because time is short and 1986 may be the year in which it is decided whether the British merchant shipbuilding industry survives or disappears. An important part of the industry has already disappeared as a result of the statement this afternoon. I submit that the subject falls within the purview of Standing Order No. 10.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter which he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

I listened with great care to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, as I listened with care to what was said in the House earlier this afternoon. As the right hon. and learned Gentleman knows, my sole duty when considering an application under Standing Order No. 10 is to decide whether it should be given priority over the business already set down for this evening or for tomorrow. I regret that I cannot rule that the matter meets all the criteria laid down in the Standing Order and I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The House respects your judgment in the conventional form and is aware of all the matters that you must take into account when coming to that judgment. It would be inappropriate to make any comment on that, but Ministers are present and they understand that this is an emergency, although we understand why you do not regard it as such. I hope that the remarks by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) will be taken into account, so that in the very near future we may have a debate.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Gentleman and the whole House understands that I am bound by the Standing Order. I hope that there are other ways in which this important matter may be raised on the Floor of the House.

Hinkley Point Power Station (Accident)

4.47 pm

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the refusal of the Central Electricity Generating Board to publish the full report of the board of inquiry into the Hinkley Point accident of 29 November."

That accident involved a release of radioactivity at Hinkley Point in Somerset and resulted in the issue of anti-radiation tablets to the work force for only the second time in Britain. The CEGB promised a board of inquiry into the accident, which would be made public.

On 13 December I was promised in a parliamentary reply that a full report of the inquiry would be issued "soon". Since then the CEGB has given me five promises about the imminent publication of the report, including a number of specific dates. Each has failed to materialise.

At 2 o'clock this afternoon, the CEGB made public a four-page document saying that there was very little to worry about. But it has specifically refused a request from me to make public the full report.

The CEGB has said that the accident was not very serious. I have no wish to disbelieve that, but the public have a right to see the evidence. There can be no acceptable reason, in the light of public concern at the time, highlighted by the Chernobyl tragedy, why the full report on this important accident should not be published. The CEGB cannot expect to receive public support for nuclear power while it keeps secret such vital information.

The CEGB's refusal runs counter to the undertakings to me. It also makes a mockery of the assurances by the Secretary of State for the Environment and the Secretary of State for Energy yesterday that in future nuclear matters would be conducted in the open.

This is an important and specific matter because we can have no faith in the assurances of the Secretaries of State about openness in nuclear matters if they allow the CEGB to keep this document secret.

In view of the widespread concern about nuclear power, it is now important that the House receives assurances that the Secretaries of State for Energy and the Environment will live up to their undertakings about full openness on this and all other nuclear matters.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman seeks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the refusal of the CEGB to publish the full report of the board of inquiry into the Hinkley Point accident on 29 November."

I regret that I have to give the hon. Gentleman the same answer that I gave to the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith). I listened carefully to what the hon. Gentleman said, but I regret that I do not consider that the matter that he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10, and I therefore cannot submit his application to the House.

BILL PRESENTED

DOG FIGHTING PENALTIES (NO. 3)

Mr. Harry Greenway presented a Bill to amend the Protection of Animals Act 1911 to increase the penalties for offences against animals under Section 1(1): And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 4 July, and to be printed. [Bill 62.]

Shops (Sunday Trading and Workers' Protection)

4.50 pm

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to reform the law relating to Sunday trading and to provide protection for workers in the retail industry.

Most hon. Members are well aware of the anomalies in the 1950 Shops Act and certain other Acts that govern the laws applicable to regulation of shop opening hours both on a Sunday and for the remainder of the week. They are also aware of the difficulties and problems of enforcing those laws. As legislators, we have a responsibility to change the law so that its application is enforceable and practical, thereby ensuring the right and just protection of the people it covers—be they shopowners, shop workers or shoppers.

There are three major criticisms of the 1950 Act—first, its many and varied anomalies, secondly, its complications and thirdly, the difficulty of enforcement. Many argue that the Act was hopelessly out of date when it was enacted, and after 36 years of far-reaching changes in the structure and pattern of retailing it is necessary to alter something that is entirely out of touch with modern conditions. The Act is a complicated piece of legislation; it is not easy for a lawyer, let alone the average shopkeeper, to understand and interpret.

There is also the problem of shops selling a mixed range of goods, some falling within the exemptions in the act and others not doing so. Compliance by shopkeepers and understanding by shoppers are severely tested, and effective enforcement becomes virtually impossible.

Added to all that, the penalties for breaches of the Act have not kept pace with the times. Currently, the maximum penalty for infringing the Sunday trading restrictions is £1,000, and only £100 for breach of general closing hour requirements. The level of fines imposed by magistrates is little deterrent to large traders to break the law. Frustration with the inadequacies of the penalties deter local authorities from enforcing the law.

Clearly, the Act has produced such difficulties and so much criticism that there is a profound need for change. Many have shared that view and attempted to change the Act. There have been six attempts by private Members in the other place and 12 attempts in this House, and in 1961 the Home Office departmental committee, under the chairmanship of Lord Crathorne, conducted considerable research. Yet they all failed to introduce the necessary legislation. Of course, most recently the Government's own proposals for complete deregulation were rejected by the House. Some hon. Members have suggested that, after that marathon debate, we should forget about reform. However, I am sure that most hon. Members, appreciating all that I have stated about the Act, would like action to be taken.

My Bill would seek the establishment of a standing conference under the chairmanship of the right hon. Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine), who should succeed to the position of Father of the House if he is re-elected, and who is recommended by the present Father of the House, my right hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan). That proves conclusively that I am suggesting things beyond the realms of personal political prejudice on this issue.

Representatives on the standing conference would include all organisations that declared interest in the recent debate — Members of Parliament, religious organisations, the Keep Sunday Special campaign, the National Chamber of Trade, the Retail Consortium, the Multiple Food Retailers Employers Association, local authority associations, the police, the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers, other interested unions and representatives of consumers. In addition, all other organisations involved in retail distribution should be considered, including ACAS, so that the broadest spectrum can be covered.

The standing conference would be asked to consider in detail the 1950 Act and other Acts involved in the retail trade, and, by agreement, to recommend to the House either amendments to the existing Act or a new shops Act. It would be asked also to consider other factors before presenting its recommendations, such as the exercise of the right to worship, the employment, remuneration and working conditions of employees, costs and prices in retail distributive industries, the interests and wishes of consumers, the incidence of crime, the demands on transport, the effect on the environment and the interests of residents.

The Bill is necessary, for a number of good and cogent reasons. Equally important, it should enable adequate protection for some of the most low-paid workers in this country. The Bill would make a serious attempt not to tinker with one or two sections of the 1950 Act, but to make constructive proposals for wide, involved and comprehensive consultation with those directly or indirectly affected. It is also essential to show the nation that this House is prepared to continue with consent, discussion and negotiation and to make all attempts necessary to remedy and rectify any and every law that is widely treated with contempt.

It is for those and all the other reasons to which I have referred that I ask the House to give leave to bring in my Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Ray Powell, Mr. Thomas Torney, Dr. Oonagh McDonald, Mr. Don Dixon, Mr. Frank Haynes, Mr. Lawrence Cunliffe, Mr. James Hamilton, Mr. Sean Hughes, Mr. David Winnick, Ms. Jo Richardson, Mr. Frank Cook and Mr. Terry Lewis.

SHOPS (SUNDAY TRADING AND WORKERS' PROTECTION)

Mr. Ray Powell accordingly presented a Bill to reform the law relating to Sunday trading and to provide protection for workers in the retail industry; And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 4 July and to be printed. [Bill 63.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

5 pm

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 3, in clause 1, page 1, line 15, at end insert—

'and;

(c) the worker concerned was guilty of the act or ommission complained of'.

No. 19, in clause 2, page 3, line 34, leave out 'in retail employment'.

No. 20, in line 34, leave out from 'makes' to 'any' in line 35.

No. 28, in clause 3, page 4, line 34, leave out 'in retail employment'.

No. 30, in page 5, line 2, leave out 'in retail employment'.

No. 43, in clause 5, page 7, line 9, at end insert—

'(e) that an employer has dismissed a worker because he made a complaint to an industrial tribunal under this section, or

(f) that the employer has not shown that the worker concerned was guilty of the act or omission complained of, or

(g) that the amount deducted or paid by one or more workers was greater than the value of the loss complained of'.

No. 44, in page 7, line 44, at end insert—

'(c) the tribunal shall make an award of compensation to the worker taking account of the loss and inconvenience suffered by the worker and the failure of the employer to comply with the law;

(d) in the case of a complaint under subsection (1)(e) the tribunal shall order reinstatement or adequate compensation for loss of employment'.

Ms. Short: Today we shall consider part I of the Bill. Having completed Second Reading, consultation and consideration in Committee, most people are aware that the Bill is seeking to cut the pay of 3 million of Britain's poorest workers in the wages council sector — for example, textiles, hotel and catering, shops and distribution. It is not widely understood, however, that the Government are making changes, which are set out in part I, to make it more likely that workers will be subjected to fines and deductions from pay for disciplinary reasons. The examples given to us in Committee by the Under-Secretary of State for Employment were lateness, absenteeism and failure to comply with health and safety standards, and the Bill refers to deductions or fines for cash shortages and stock deficiencies. The Bill makes it clear that an individual who can prove that he is not guilty of causing any shortage of cash or stock might still be subject to a deduction and have no right to have that reversed.

The laws that will be repealed by the Bill are set out in the Truck Acts, and the Paymaster General is fond of sneering at their old age and making that a dogmatic reason in itself for repealing them, irrespective of whether they have worked well. The part of the Truck Acts that applies to deductions and fines is not that ancient in that it was enacted in 1896. That measure is currently in force and it limits the extent to which deductions and fines are used to discipline workers. I am sure that its repeal will lead to a great increase in the use of deductions and fines.

The Act lays down a number of conditions, which means that employers must think carefully before making deductions. It provides that there must be a signed contract, with the worker signing and agreeing that he is willing to be subject to deductions. The employer has to provide written particulars of the sum that has been lost or of the omission that led to the fine or deduction. A register must be kept of all fines and the deduction must not exceed the value of the loss of which the employer is complaining. The amount deducted must be reasonable.

In the light of these restrictions, the making of deductions is not a widespread practice in British industry. These restrictions are to be lifted, however, and under the new law anyone will face a fine or deduction if he agrees to sign a contract which states or even implies that his employer might subject him to fines or deductions. There will be no requirement that a fine must be reasonable or must not exceed the loss to which the employer has been subjected. The employer will not have to specify what act or omission led to the loss that led in turn to the deduction.

The only protection that the Government are offering is that a limited number of workers—those in retailing —will not be able to lose more than 10 per cent. of their wages each week if a deduction is made as a consequence of a cash shortage or stock deficiency. The Government have made no case for that protection being restricted to retail workers when many other workers might be subjected to deductions.

The Government tell us that we need not worry and that all workers will be properly protected. They say that if a worker is subjected unfairly to a deduction, he will be able to take his case to a tribunal. However, if a worker goes before a tribunal and says that he was desperate for a job, signed a contract which said that he might face deductions in certain circumstances, had £5 or £10 deducted from miserly low wages, can prove to the tribunal that he was not responsible for the loss and states that a fellow employee is willing to confess, the tribunal will not be able to reverse the deduction.

The tribunals will be extremely weak. They will be able to impose a penalty on an employer only to the extent of ordering him to restore the amount of deduction or fine. Therefore, the Bill is a charter for employers to make a deduction when in doubt. If an employer is found to have broken the law in making a deduction, he will have to pay back only the £5 or £10 that was deducted. That sort of sum might be considerable for someone earning £50 a week, but it will not be very much for the average employer.

The new clause and the amendments seek to amend the Bill to prevent the widespread growth of deductions from workers' pay for disciplinary reasons. The Government seem to envisage the operation of the Bill as part of a great move to macho management. The new clause would impose a limit of 10 per cent. of gross wages on all deductions and fines for all workers. If the Government are not willing to accept this proposal, they must tell us why retailing is so special. Why will it be all right to deduct 20 per cent. of the wages of a cleaner or hotel chambermaid, for example, who might be working for similarly low wages of £40 to £50 a week, and not all right to take more than 10 per cent. from the wages of a retail worker? We accept the 10 per cent. limit—we would like a lower limit—but there is no reason why such protection should extend only to retail workers.

My argument is not theoretical. In the past, employers have taken enormous sums from low-paid workers. Petrol pump attendant work is notorious. The famous case of Barrett was taken under the Truck Acts. A young man who was unemployed agreed to accept a job at a low rate of pay because he was desperate for employment. His contract stated that he would be responsible for any till shortages. He thought that that was reasonable, but he did not know that many others would have access to his till. In time, he faced deductions of £20 a week from a wage of slightly more than £50 a week. If the Bill is enacted without the amendments that we are proposing, it is likely that many more workers will face deductions of that sort without being able to take action.

Secondly, the new clause provides that an employer who makes a deduction from a worker's wages will be required to show that the individual facing a deduction or fine was guilty of the act of which he complains. It is remarkable that under the Bill an individual who can prove that he had no responsibility for a shortage of cash or stock, or some other loss or damage, and can prove that someone else carried the responsibility, will still face fines and deductions if he has signed a contract that states that he might be subjected to fines or deductions. That is unacceptable, and we believe that all reasonable people will take that view. We are proposing that workers should be subjected to deductions and fines only when the employer can show that the worker was guilty of the act or omission of which he complains.

Thirdly, the new clause addresses itself to those who are subject to an illegal deduction and take their case to a tribunal in the way that the Government propose, only to find that they lose their job because the employer is annoyed at being dragged before a tribunal for breaking the law. At present, a worker who has been employed for less than two years has no right to initiate an action for unfair dismissal. A part-time worker—40 per cent. of retail workers are part-timers, and it is a sector where the Government expect many deductions to be made because they have made special provision for retailing—has to be employed for five years before he has the protection of being able to complain that he was dismissed unfairly.

Under the Bill, someone who faces an unfair deduction and loses money from a small wage packet that he cannot afford to lose is offended and hurt by the suggestion that he is guilty of dishonesty when he is not. He may go to all the trouble and loss of time from work that is involved in taking and proving a case before a tribunal. But if he takes that course, he can be sacked, and he will find that he can do nothing about that. This is outrageous. We are saying that anyone who is sacked for taking a case to a tribunal that finds his employer guilty of making an illegal deduction should have the right to bring an action for unfair dismissal and be restored to his job or to receive compensation for the loss of employment.

New clause 9 would empower tribunals to award compensation to a worker, taking into account the loss and inconvenience to that worker of taking the case to the tribunal. The Minister told us repeatedly in Committee that we must not worry about some low-paid workers being likely to lose large chunks of their money because, if anything wrong was done, they would be able to take their case to an industrial tribunal. Taking a case to an industrial tribunal takes an awful lot of courage, organisation, time, energy and money. It means loss of pay for the days that have to be taken off to prepare the case and to appear before the tribunal, and travelling time.

A worker in retailing might earn £50 or £60 a week and be subjected to a deduction of £5 or £6, but it will cost more than that to take the case to a tribunal to prove innocence, and the worker can be awarded only the £5 or £6 deduction. The Government are saying that people have the theoretical right to take their case to a tribunal. In practice, employees will be scared to take a case to a tribunal because they will be sacked if they do, or they will not be able to afford to pursue the case. No employer will be intimidated by the possibility of being taken to a tribunal, however, because the punishment that can be meted out is so small.

The Minister made much of the fact that small employers are worried about industrial tribunals. Surveys show that they do not like to be taken to tribunals and that they fear cases of unfair dismissal. We accept that, but the Government have to take account of tribunals' powers in such cases. They can force an employer to take back a sacked employee or to award compensation, which can be thousands of pounds, for loss of a job if the employer is unwilling to take the worker back.

Small employers find tribunals frightening because they fear losing and what might be done to them. Employers will laugh at the tribunals on deductions, however, if their only power is to force the employer to pay back £5 to some low-paid employee. The employer will not bother to go along. Rather he will send the office-keeper or even write a letter saying, "I do not care about the outcome." Being taken to a tribunal will not be onerous. It will prove no sanction in preventing employers from imposing illegal deductions on low-paid employees.

Everything about the new clause is reasonable. If it is not accepted, workers throughout the country should note that, from now on, any employer who wants to impose fines or deductions on workers can have a field day. It will be simple to take large chunks from workers' pay. That is likely to happen extensively in the least well-organised sectors of the economy, where low pay and bad employment conditions are prevalent.

The Government have introduced a power, but seem unconcerned to include sufficient protections to ensure that the right to make a deduction or to impose a fine will not be exercised unless there is real evidence that a worker is guilty of an offence. Nor have they ensured that, if an employer behaves wrongly, a worker can have his or her rights protected.

Without the new clause, the Bill will be deeply objectionable. It will lead to a widespread growth in deductions, conflict and tension in industry and unjust reductions in the wages of some of the poorest paid workers in the country.

5.15 pm

Mr. Ian Mikardo (Bow and Popular): In Committee, we often complained—the complaint was made by some Conservative Members as well—that much of the Bill showed evidence of having been drafted by people who had never seen the inside of a factory, store room or retail establishment. Many factors about real commercial and industrial life have not been considered in the least.

We see things most clearly if we take hard practical examples. I shall take the example of a trade supplier. It may be a supplier of motor accessories or tools. It is therefore outside the retail industry—a wholesaler. The front part of the establishment has a trade counter, behind which is a store. The chap who owns it employs a young fellow as a storesman, who goes to the back to fetch stuff out.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): The hon. Gentleman used the words "trade counter". I did not hear him mention them in Committee, but they are relevant in this context. According to the explanatory notes, we are concerned with places where members of the general public are served. Would he like to guess whether a person who goes to a trade counter is a member of the general public or some other special type of person who is not covered by the Bill?

Mr. Mikardo: I am talking about an establishment that sells to the trade, such as a builder's merchant who sells to builders, not members of the general public, or a chap who sells tools to engineers, or a chap who sells motor accessories to repair garages. His having a trade counter takes us entirely out of the ambit of retailing.

The storesman picks up the requisition and puts two of these, one of those and two of those in a tray and brings them out to the trade counter to sell them. There is nothing to prevent the owner from telling his storesman at the end of the week, "There is a stock deficiency of £40." He does not have to prove it. He can tell his storesman, "I shall make a deduction from your pay," and because the business is not retail, the deduction is not limited to 10 per cent. of the storesman's wage.

The owner does not have to say that the deficiency is in five-inch spanners, and that nine have gone. He does not have to say, "I know that you are responsible because I saw you going out with some spanners in your jacket pocket." He does not have to adduce one tittle of evidence to demonstrate that the storesman is responsible for the stock shortage. Indeed, he does not have to produce one tittle of evidence to demonstrate that there is a stock shortage at all. He can invent a stock shortage. He can even create a stock shortage himself by nicking half a dozen electric bulbs and taking them home. He could then tell his assistant, Joe Bloggs, "Half a dozen bulbs are missing and you have to pay for them."

I hope that the Minister will not say in reply, "Not many employers would behave in that way." Of course not many would, but the law tries to deal as well as it can with all contingencies, not merely with majorities or minorities. Only a small percentage of the population engages in house-breaking, but that does not stop us having laws to deal with those who do.

The employer can tell an employee, "There is a stock shortage," but he does not have to prove that there is one or that the employee is responsible for it. Someone else may have been responsible. He may have been responsible himself. On that basis, he can make a deduction.

The lad knows that he was not responsible for the shortage because he knows that the old man nicked the bulbs and took them away. He is angry about that, so he decides to go to an industrial tribunal. That is not easy. As the Minister said—my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) agreed—there are difficulties for employers, but the difficulties for employees are much greater. Those who work in sizeable establishments which are unionised have the help of their unions, but the wages council industries are almost entirely composed of trades where the average establishment is small and the turnover of labour is rapid by comparison with other trades.

That is true of the hotel and catering industry. It is true to a lesser extent in some parts of the garment and needle trades and to an even lesser extent of retailing. In all those trades, unionisation is rare because of the difficulty of organising in establishments where only a handful of people are employed, and where that handful of people is liable to change rapidly.

Therefore, the trade supplier for whom the lad works is unlikely to be unionised.

Ms. Clare Short: My hon. Friend is right to say that the workers who are most likely to be subject to deductions are low-paid workers in the wages council industries, but the provisions mean that, in future, all workers will be liable to such deductions.

Mr. Mikardo: I appreciate that it could happen to any worker. The Bill gives the employer greater power than rests with the judiciary, because it gives him the power to fine without proof of guilt. No magistrates court, county court, assizes, appeal court or High Court could fine me without having established that I was guilty of something. But under the Bill, any worker anywhere—those who will get it in the neck will be the low-paid workers in the wages council, non-unionised industries—can be fined by his employer in a way that the Lord Chief Justice could not fine me. He can be fined by his employer without a jot or tittle of evidence that there has been any culpability.

For the life of me, I do not understand how anyone can begin to justify that position. There is no hon. Member who, if it happened to him, would not believe himself to be the victim of a gross injustice and who would not scream to high heaven about it. How can we justify inflicting upon others a condition which we would never accept for a moment as applying to ourselves?

[Mr. Mikardo]

Let me return to my trade supplier. The lad is aggrieved and, notwithstanding the fact that he knows little about tribunals and that he does not have a trade union to represent him and that he does not know where the tribunal is or how to get the forms, he asks round—perhaps at the citizens advice bureau or perhaps his friends—and he appeals to a tribunal. His employer says, "You had better drop that, Harry, because if you continue with it, you will get your few quid from me, but you will get the sack as well." There is not one word in the Bill to prevent that.

Even worse, the employer need not even forewarn the lad. The lad goes to the tribunal and gets an award giving him back his own money. That is the only award that he will get. There will be no compensation for the time during which he lost the money or damages for the aggravation that he has been caused or the injustice of being falsely accused of theft. There is not a halfpenny of compensation for that. All that he will get from the great victory is his own money back. Then his employer says, "I am fed up with you. You were out last Thursday at the tribunal. I do not want you; I want people who will be here every day." There is nothing in the Bill to prevent that.

I shall listen with great care to the Minister, who, in his personal relationships, is a fundamentally decent chap, trying to justify, within the parameters of his personal morality, this hideous, raving injustice.

Mr. Holt: We had many a happy hour in Committee debating this element of the Bill. Like the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short), I am sure that many thousands of people will discover, to their surprise, the legislation that the Government have introduced. I found elements of surprise even at the highest levels of the Institute of Personnel Management. Indeed, I found a Minister who was amazed when I told him what the Government proposed to do, and who encouraged me to continue my vendetta against the Government on this part of the Bill.

The Government have been extremely clever in many ways; one must give them credit for that. Many Conservative Members, not necessarily supported by Opposition Members, are in favour of the proposals in the wages council element of the total package. But this curate's egg brings with it not only the simple abolition of the wages councils or their restructuring and reformation, but more work for the lawyers in the industrial tribunal courts. I put down a marker that I shall return to industrial tribunals several times.

I endorse the view of the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) that the Government's proposals will create a minefield of trouble for them. I have the simplistic view, as one who has worked in industry for most of his life, that the best industrial relations are those engendered between employers and employees without interference from Government. The Government should be only a last resort when all else appears to have failed.

The Truck Acts have been on the statute book for a long time, but that does not necessarily make them bad. Marriage laws have been on the statute book for a long time, but we are not proposing to abolish marriage and to introduce some new consolidation Bill.

Mr. Tom Pendry (Stalybridge and Hyde): Give them time.

5.30 pm

Mr. Holt: The Government have no right to bring before the House change for the sake of change, without justification. The Government have made no case for changing and abolishing the Trucks Acts' element regarding deductions from wages. I can find no Government supporters for the fundamentals of this issue.

The Government will say, "We carried out a survey which showed that the majority of employers favoured the 10 per cent. deduction method." If one is asked whether one wants to be shot in the left or right foot, one makes a choice, but one would prefer not to be shot in the foot because it is unnecessary. From my practical experience and from what I have read in the media and, more particularly, in my institute's journals, I can find little evidence that there is a minute case, let alone an overwhelming one, for the introduction of this element.

Obviously, there are rogue employers and rogue employees, but the law in situ is working. It is not breaking down.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. David Trippier): I have often heard my hon. Friend speak about industrial tribunals, and I respect his view, although I do not share it. Is he suggesting that he would prefer the existing Truck Acts which cover this part of the Bill to remain in force without the built-in protection which he must acknowledge will be given to workers by limiting the deduction to 10 per cent. of pay?

Mr. Holt: My experience is that the law is known and understood by, and working for, the most humble in the land to the most eminent members of the Confederation of British Industry and the Institute of Directors. The Minister may argue that greater protection is being afforded to employees, and I believe that he sincerely thinks that. However, I cannot accept that, because I believe that the scenario put forward by the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar is much more realistic in this context. As I understand the Bill—I am willing to be corrected —the protection that the Government are affording is only that deductions will be limited to 10 per cent. of pay, and that if a person goes to a tribunal, that money must be repaid without compensation.

Ms. Short: In Committee and today we have talked as though the 10 per cent. protection will extend to all workers, but that is not so. It applies only to workers in retailing for cash shortages and stock deficiencies, not for lateness or absenteeism. Therefore, only a small group of workers will be protected by the 10 per cent. provision.

Mr. Holt: I accept that, and it is a reason why I am puzzled why the Government are introducing this element as such an enormous protection. In my 30 years in business, no employee has ever told me a tale of an employer removing money, without the employee having a right to go to court. Employees already have that right. We are only duplicating it or, worse still, weakening it.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): There is a significant difference which I may develop if I am called to speak. Under the old law, an employer must take a worker to court and prove his guilt, but under the Bill a worker must run to an industrial tribunal and defend his innocence. That is completely different.

Mr. Holt: With respect, I think that that worked both ways. I understand that an employer will now be able to rely on an industrial tribunal.

I did not wish to develop my view on industrial tribunals at this point, but a tribunal is a lottery. All hon. Members who read my magnificent speech in December on industrial tribunals—at that time in the morning, there were not many listening—will know that the Minister accepted the Russian roulette aspect of industrial tribunals. Industrial tribunals cannot have an appeal made against them except on a point of law, whereas under the present law, if a deduction is under dispute, the full panoply of the law is available to both sides, and the case may end up in the other place or, perhaps, even in Europe. Under the Bill, that will be denied. Therefore, far from giving added protection to employees, the Minister is seeking to give extremely limited protection; it is subject to no penalty and it is a lottery. Once a case goes to an industrial tribunal, the outcome depends on how the chairman felt when he got up that morning and came to work. Either the employee or the employer will be lucky, because that is how the case will be decided. A decision will be made only on whether the deductions made up to that point were lawful, or were unlawful and must be repaid.

This seems to be legislation for the sake of legislation. The honest truth is that the Government merely intended to abolish the Truck Acts. That may have been argued and justified. However, to erect a smokescreen by suggesting that they are being replaced by something superior, fairer and nicer simply does not hold water. It does not bear examination. The Government's case is wafer-thin, and water is seeping through.

Even at this late stage I suggest that my hon. Friend the Minister has a deathbed repentance on this aspect of the Bill. Then, some of us could with much greater heart support other parts of the Bill which we favour. I seek to be fair and discriminating by supporting the parts which are good law and by not supporting those which are bad law. The Government have produced bad law on this aspect, and it will not be long before it will bring the whole Bill into disrepute. I do not want that.

In his intervention, the Minister made it clear that in reply he would seek to justify this element by saying that it gives additional benefit to employees by making industrial tribunals available—I promise that we shall talk more about industrial tribunals later—and by staggering repayments over two, three or more months —[Interruption.] Did I hear something about 10 o'clock tomorrow morning? We cannot expect the country to support Conservative Governments and Ministers —[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]—if they introduce bad laws for which there is no public support. There is no public support for the abolition of the Truck Acts from professional, managerial, trade union or working people. There is none. Apart from a place which I am not supposed to mention, I can find little support for these proposals.

Whenever I speak on this very serious subject, I try to introduce a light-hearted tone. The hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) and I have debated this issue several times, and he knows that hon. Members should not be misled by my style. I have spoken to many of my right hon. and hon. Friends who are not all in the Chamber today, and I think that I reflect their views when I say that the Government have impaled themselves on something similar to the Shops Bill. The Government should listen to what their Back Benchers are saying, especially if those Back Benchers are in touch with industry and commerce.

I have yet to be shown any evidence to support this part of the Bill. My hon. Friend the Minister must make his case, or we shall be here for a long time. If he does not make his case, I shall carry on asking question after question, trying to find what justification there is for introducing such a deduction. Regardless of whether the employee is highly or lowly paid, the deduction is very immoral. It is immoral to take money away from people without justification or proof and without any recourse to a normal court. That part of the Bill does not merit my support. The Government are seeking not merely to throw out the baby with the bath water but to throw out the bath too.

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley): I rise to support the amendment, and am greatly encouraged by some of the comments of the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt). In Committee, there were one or two exchanges on this issue, and perhaps our points have now sunk into Conservative minds. If the hon. Gentleman is joined by some of his colleagues tonight, there may be one or two dramatic changes to the Bill.

In the early stages of the Bill, we said that we thought that it was the Government's original intention to abolish wages councils altogether. But they realised that it was such an outrageous idea that they retained the Bill while nobbling its contents.

5.45 pm

The Truck Acts date back more than 150 years to 1831. The Government are making these alterations for the sake of change. They certainly will not benefit the workers and that is why, in Committee, Opposition Members resisted the Bill with great tenacity and conviction for two and a half months. The Minister will probably say that there will be a contract. That is true, but we object to the fact that the contract is to be solely on the employer's terms. We frequently pointed out that in such desperate times, with 4 million people unemployed, low-paid workers—who are the subject of this Bill—may be induced or forced to accept intolerable conditions just for the sake of the job.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) pointed out, the employer's entitlement to make weekly deductions is quite outrageous. There is no onus on the employer to make a case for the deduction. We contend that the employer could be dishonest about his case for deciding to withhold part of an employee's weekly wage packet. Time and again we have said that if there is any dishonesty—something that we would not defend—the matter should be pursued through the courts. The police could be brought in and a case could be made. Thus the employer could prosecute in a court or dismiss the man. There are options other than the one that seems to have the Minister's favour.

For the first five or six weeks in Committee the Minister kept on saying that employees could go to an industrial tribunal. But during one sitting he suddenly said that he did not want too many appeals to be made to tribunals as that might clog up the works. He implied that the odd case might be all right, but that people should not pursue their rights too often.

Mr. Holt: I believe that that point coincided with a written question to the Minister from me. I asked him what provision he was making for additional courts or tribunals. He replied that he was making none, and suddenly the need for tribunals also waned.

Mr. Eastham: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that intervention.

Hon Members on both sides of the Committee then pursued the Minister about the provision being made for personnel, and so on. The Minister said that there would be other people. On another occasion, he suddenly mentioned ACAS, as though that might make up for the deficiencies in wages inspectors. We found it less than convincing that the Minister should say in one breath that someone could go to an appeal tribunal and then say in another that he did not want too many appeals as they might clog up the works. That did not show any great enthusiasm for justice for the workers.

The amendment makes a good case. If a worker goes to a tribunal, he may incur considerable personal expense. He will have to take time off work, and he probably will not be compensated for it. For all we know, the appeal tribunal may not be in his town, and he may have to pay the cost of travelling 10 or 15 miles in order to prove his innocence. Indeed, after spending time and money he may be found innocent, but he has no apparent right to be reinstated or compensated. Because of that, we are correct in saying that it is a worthy amendment and the Minister should give real consideration to it.

Mr. Holt: The hon. Gentleman made an interesting and valuable point about the fares that people have to pay. The hon. Gentleman realises that the fares are available to anyone going to a tribunal if he has to travel over six miles. These fares are paid out of public money. The money does not come from a respondent who may have flouted the law in getting an appellant to the tribunal in the first place.

Mr. Eastham: The hon. Gentleman has reminded me that people who have to travel a certain distance will receive compensation. Nowadays, it costs a small fortune to travel on public transport, even if one is travelling only three or four miles. There is a considerable penalty on those who must undertake two journeys.

When a worker proves that he has a legitimate claim, he should have certain rights. If the Minister were fair minded, he would say that there is justification for what we are saying and he is prepared to put that part of the Bill right. We do not like the Bill. We object to it clause by clause, but at least we are trying to make it more just than it is.

We contend that there should be penalties for an employer as well as an employee. I have never known anything as one-sided as the Bill. The Bill contains next to no penalties whatsoever for an employer. For those reasons, I hope that the Minister will be sympathetic and give serious thought to the matter.

Mr. Nellist: I have spent the best part of three months considering the Bill in a Committee Room. It is interesting that of all the Tory Members who sat silent during the Committee's consideration of the Bill, only a couple are now prepared to sit in the Chamber during the debate. Be that as it may, the central importance of proposed new clause 9 relates to part I of the Bill which deals with the right of an employer to make deductions. The tone and tenor of the Bill and of the Government's general approach to working people in British society are set in line 2 of clause 1 which states:

"An employer shall not make any deduction from any wages of any worker of his".

That is the possessive nature of the kind of society the Tory Government would like to see. The hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean)——

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): Unamended.

Mr. Nellist: Yes, unamended. The hon. Member for Penrith and The Border introduced a description in Committee of the relationship between master and servant. He thought that the Bill epitomised that description. It is necessary for us to attempt to amend, at Report stage, the language and principles of that part of the Bill. My comrade the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) said in Committee that the Tory Government are only interested in workers insofar as they are interested in the appendages at the end of their two arms. That description came out in the debate on that part of the Bill.

Unless we succeed in adding the new clause and making the consequent amendments to part I, employers will be given power to discipline workers by fining them. Clause 1 is one-sided. It gives power to employers to deduct the wages of workers, albeit with a maximum limit of 10 per cent., without even making mandatory the joint signature of an employer and a worker in an agreement that that is the case. No doubt we shall deal with that specific point later.

The Bill weakens the current position under the Truck Acts as to the power of employers to make deductions. Central to the arguments which other comrades have already deployed, it reverses the whole concept of what we, and, no doubt you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, were told at school—that under British law a person is innocent until he is taken to court and proved guilty. The Bill allows an employer to be the judge, jury and executioner. An employer may implement his decision by imposing a fine, saying, as a concession to a worker, "Go to an industrial tribunal, if you wish to do so, to prove and defend your innocence, because I, as an employer, have decided that you are guilty."

Ms. Clare Short: The position is even worse than that described by my hon. Friend. I am sure he agrees that it is possible for a worker to face a fine, go to a tribunal and prove his innocence but, because an employer can say that under the contract of employment the employer is entitled to impose a fine, he cannot have it overturned. Even if a worker proves his innocence, he can still be subjected to a fine.

Mr. Nellist: My hon. Friend is absolutely correct. I hope to return to the point later. To add to the point that she made, third parties could be involved, which could be established by the tribunal, but the power would exist for an employer to make the original deduction. As a result of information coming from embassies, certain immigration procedures, such as those which applies when people appear at airports and points of entry, have been tightened up. In most British legislation there is a concept that a person is innocent until he is proved guilty. The Bill turns that concept on its head.

Let us imagine that an employer discovers that there is a shortage of stock or a shortage of money in the till. There could be a number of reasons for that. It could be because of poor management or a lack of supervision of those working on the till or doing the stock checks. It could be due to the systems that are set up for stock control. It could even be due to the fact that too few workers are employed in a certain section and the work load causes stress and strain. The Bill does not attempt to deal with problems such as those. It merely gives an employer the immediate right of fining an employee whom he considers caused a problem. It could be that a third party, some other person, is responsible for the condition. In that event, an employer can say, "Go and prove your innocence in an industrial tribunal."

Ms. Clare Short: Is my hon. Friend aware of the report of the employment unit at the law centre of north Kensington entitled "Fingers in the Till"? The report demonstrates that many stock shortages are caused by incompetent organisation, such as when a shop reduces prices but fails to knock the values off the notional stock. The shop thinks that it has a shortage but it does not. It is perfectly possible that the shortages are no one's fault but are due to incompetent organisation.

Mr. Nellist: My hon. Friend has referred to the example I gave of the possibility of a stock or till shortage occurring. The Kensington law centre, citizens' advice bureaux and my own legal and advice service in Coventry are aware of cases. Labour Members of the Committee received a number of documents and affidavits. We were given thousands of examples of individual workers in the retail trade and the petrol industry who were fined for actions which were not of their own doing—a third party or incompetence was the main reason. Workers are offered that option to prove their innocence before an industrial tribunal.

Difficulties are associated with appearing before the tribunal. A worker would lose a day's pay by taking that opportunity to prove his innocence. He might have to pay for legal assistance. Character witnesses would lose wages. Even if the worker won his case, he would get back only the money that had been deducted in the first instance by the employer.

In most cases, the worker is likely to be someone on low pay. In Committee, the Under-Secretary of State made some points about that. A low-paid worker in receipt of family income supplement whose employer deducted the maximum of 10 per cent. of the gross wage from net take-home pay, after tax and national insurance deductions, might appeal through the normal appeal channels. His net pay might then be below the family income supplement level and he would be worse off than workers in a similar position. According to the letter of 8 April, by the Under-Secretary of State for Employment—the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier)—it would not be possible for that worker then to claim additional family income supplement.

The Government lay down definitions stating the level below which the income of a family which includes a certain number of children should ever fall; yet the Bill would allow an employer to make deductions from a worker's wages which could take him below the poverty line defined by the Government, and he would have no redress.

The Under-Secretary of State held out a rather funny lifeline. In a letter written on 11 March, he stated that if it were proved before an industrial tribunal that a deduction was incorrectly made, it was possible for the worker to appeal to the independent Inland Revenue tax commissioners for a tax rebate on that deduction. A worker on £100 a week gross, which is a pretty high wage in the service sector, whose net take-home pay was £65 or £68 a week could lose up to £10 in deductions because the employer had accused him of being responsible for a till or stock shortage. That worker could go to the tax commissioners and attempt to claim £3·30 of that sum. What a farce. If an employer suspects that an employee is a thief, he should take the employee to court where the burden of proof should rest on the employer.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): I am not an expert on the Bill and was not a member of the Committee. What I have heard is appalling and unbelievable. Do I understand that clause 9 as it stands turns the whole basis of British jurisprudence on its head? The whole of our law is based on a person being innocent until proved guilty. The clause does the very opposite. This clause alone is a massive step. I hope that the Bill does not turn the whole of British jurisprudence on its head. If the clause does that, it is almost a crime to put it before the House.

Mr. Nellist: I am sorry to disappoint my hon. Friend, but the clauses do not get any better. Until 1979, our youth were taught in schools that a person was innocent until proved guilty by a jury of 12 of his peers. My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) eloquently summed up in fewer words than I have used what the clause does—it turns British jurisprudence on its head. People will be assumed to be guilty. They will need to prove their innocence before an industrial tribunal.

A full-time worker who has not worked continuously for two years or a part-time worker who has worked fewer than 30 hours a week and has not been in the job for five years can go back to the employer the day after winning the case in the industrial tribunal and, at the flick of a finger, the employer can sack him. The worker cannot go back to the industrial tribunal a second time to ask for his job back, because he would not qualify.

Mr. Dixon: If an employer sacked an employee, could it not take the whole of his lying-on pay to pay the rest of the fine?

Mr. Nellist: That is correct.

Most of the workers affected by the Bill earn £60, £70 or £80 a week. We are talking about an employer's power to deduct 10 per cent. from gross wages, which means £6, £7 or £8 a week. Unlike most Tory Members, many of whom count their income in tens or hundreds of thousands of pounds a year, the workers about whom we are talking have only one job. They are not like the right hon. and learned Member for Hexham (Mr. Rippon) with his 35 jobs—one as a Member of Parliament, one as a QC in the law courts and one as director of a company and with 32 chairmanships under his belt. The right hon. and learned Gentleman might be able to afford to have deducted from his pay packet 10 per cent. of the income from one of those 35 jobs. A poorly paid worker in a time of mass unemployment—when 4·5 million people are denied the chance to work—tries to bring up his family on £60, £70 or £80 a week, yet an employer may have the power to deduct 10 per cent. of his wages without needing to prove that a crime has taken place. Labour Members oppose that.

On 11 February, the Paymaster General and Minister for Employment described this part of the Bill as providing a "fairer set of statutory rights concerning deductions"—[Official Report, 11 February 1986; Vol. 91, c. 801.]

The Bill does not mention that the deductions must be fair and reasonable. It turns the concept of justice upside down on its head. It allows employers to decide guilt and say to the workers, "You have the opportunity before an industrial tribunal to attempt to prove your innocence." The measure will be used mainly against low-paid workers—as my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) said, mainly those in areas where trade unions are not yet predominant in industry. For all those reasons and for others, which no doubt my hon. Friends will give, I urge the House to adopt the new clause and the consequent amendments and to defeat this part of the Bill.

Mr. Pendry: I shall not take too long, because the points made by Labour Members and by the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) have shown that this part of the Bill and, indeed, the whole Bill, are nonsense. The hon. Member for Langbaurgh must not believe that the sanctity of marriage will necessarily be preserved by a Government as hellbent on deregulation as this one. The Under-Secretary of State might address his remarks to that.

I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) is present and to make the point he did, and that we have a wider audience, although it is not much wider, than in Committee.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): It is a good audience.

Mr. Pendry: Yes, it is a good audience. My hon. Friends are beginning to understand—I do not blame them—the ramifications of the legislation. As a result of the debate on this and other clauses, the people outside the House will also begin to understand what will hit them.

The decency of my hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) always shines through on these occasions. He began in Committee by referring to the Minister as a "chum". He has gone down a little and called him a "decent chap". I suspect that my hon. Friend, because he is decent and so perceptive, probably knows something that we do not know. I want therefore to finish my speech, soon so that I can hear the reply by the Under-Secretary of State to our points. It may be that, because last Thursday Rossendale went Labour for the first time in its history, the hon. Gentleman is a little shaken and is rocking a little. He might therefore listen more attentively to what people, especially his constituents, say.

I am pleased that my hon. friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) made it plain that this does not just affect low-paid workers. The clause affects a whole range of workers in this country. Of course, the Opposition are mostly concerned about low-paid workers, because a 10 per cent. deduction is bad enough for some workers—we think it is too much—but for the workers we represent, such as home workers, cleaners and many others, it is an unbearable burden for them to have to endure.

Ms. Clare Short: It is very important that we all remember that it is not just 10 per cent. There is a limit of 10 per cent. per week for workers in retailing, but for all other workers there is no limit. We must not mislead the public into thinking that it is only 10 per cent., bad as that is, because the sky is the limit.

Mr. Pendry: I was just about to make the point that that is the bottom line. The deduction is open-ended and the ramifications are such that, when the full force of our case is heard outside, I believe that the Government will be forced to think again and, not for the first time, will have to retrack their legislation in a short space of time.

As I have said, most of the points have already been made and it would be silly to go over them again. However, the workers involved in this part of the Bill are certainly proved guilty before they have even had a trial. The employers have it all their own way under the Bill at present.

Many of the points made in Committee have not been listened to clearly by the Minister. However, at times he did attempt to answer our points and said that he would reflect on them and come back to us. I hope that this is one occasion when the Minister will answer the forceful points made in Committee and on the Floor of the House much more positively and constructively.

The hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) got it right again. I do not want to praise him too much because it could damn him with his colleagues. Unfortunately, he has made great points, but he has not voted with us in the Lobby. I hope that on this occasion he will have the courage. It is no good making those points and sounding reasonable if, at the end of the day, he does not join us in the Lobby. No doubt he will attract a great deal of attention in his local press.

Mr. Holt: I would just like to comment on the hon. Gentleman's point about the local press. We are discussing the Wages Bill, on which it might be thought that I was being a little bit naughty to my own side, on the same day as the Government announced the closure of Smith's Dock in my constituency.

Mr. Pendry: I am sure that that has reinforced the hon. Gentleman's position in supporting us on this occasion.

The hon. Member for Langbaurgh rightly said that the law should be a backstop for industrial relations. I should have thought that the Conservative party had learned its lesson. They began trying to introduce legislation in a heavy-handed way in the early 1970s and they had to shelve that legislation because it clearly did not work. My bet is that this legislation will be shelved in a similar way. I certainly wish to hear the Minister disprove that and perhaps he can make an early start by agreeing to the points that have been made by my hon. Friends in this debate.

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): We should cast our minds back to the Second reading of the Bill, especially when we are dealing with part 1 in relation to the Truck Acts. The case argued by the Government was, at surface value, probably correct. The Truck Act of 1831 probably needed some amendment and refining and we probably needed a new act to be put on the statute book to give some support and protection to workers. In fact, we have seen a complete reversal of the Truck Acts and what they stood for.

The fundamental principles of the Truck Act of 1831 was "fair and reasonable". The Truck Acts stood for a certain amount of justice. That is not to say that we must keep the Truck Acts on the statute book for ever more. However, one would have hoped that the fundamental principles of the Truck Acts, which have been tried and tested, would have remained. I have worked in industry for a number of years and have had dealings with the Truck Acts. I know they have operated well and the employers and trade unions have taken on board the fundamental principles and tried to develop them in negotiations when the Truck Acts have been involved.

Many hon. Members, especially from the Opposition, who were not on the Committee, have been aghast at what is in section 1. Clause 1 of the Bill has turned natural justice on its head. A worker now has to prove his innocence after being found guilty. That moves away completely from the underlying position of the Truck Acts which clause 1 of the Bill is supposed to update.

Nobody in the House has defended the Government's position. It would be difficult for the alliance to defend the Government's position, because there are no alliance Members in the Chamber. They have not tabled any amendments to the Bill, let alone to clause 1. That is deplorable, when the alliance is always stating that it is a protector of workers' rights. Having said that, nobody has come to the defence of the Minister. In fact, he has been attacked by his own party for the position the Government have taken on clause 1.

When the Minister opposes the new clause, I have no doubt that the defence will rest on the industrial tribunals. Many points have been made as to how there are blockages in the industrial tribunals, and how difficult and expensive it is for people. In low-paid areas people may be fearful of going to industrial tribunals.

Many low-paid workers have been employed for less than two years. Also, the restrictions within those establishments could debar many people who could be caught under this part of the Bill from using the tribunals, even if they wanted to.

In Committee I think that I clearly illustrated what we are talking about. It was brought to my attention that in one of the country clubs in Sheffield—there are not many of them—the owner had sacked four employees. Not only had he sacked them, but he owed them between £150 and £200. They did not even know the reasons for their sacking. When they tried to extract the reasons from the owner, he said that they had been sacked for stealing and dishonesty. They were absolutely flabbergasted. There are a number of courses they can adopt. They can go to tribunals or the courts. However, that is the type of employer that many people will have to deal with. When natural justice is turned on its head, those people have greater licence than before. The principles that were originally emobdied in the Truck Acts should be adhered to in the Bill. However, they will be turned on their head, and there will be less protection for the workers than previously.

When we were discussing part I of the Bill in Committee, we brought fraud to the Minister's attention. That was reported in the Financial Times of 13 March, which showed that 40 per cent. of United Kingdom companies are now experiencing fraud, and in London alone there was £867 million-worth of fraud, which had been notified to the police and the fraud squad. We are trying to deal with fraud, yet in the Bill we are taking away a fundamental right and turning British justice on its head; we are attacking the lowest paid in our society, and taking away their protection.

I hope that Conservative Members have listened to the only constructive statement to have come from Conservative Benches, totally opposing part I and the removal of those basic principles. I hope that having done so, many of the colleagues of the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) will support new clause 9 in the Lobby.

Mr. Dixon: I shall confine my remarks to our amendments Nos. 43 and 44, which will protect workers.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) was astonished at part I. I should like to tell him that it gets worse. Throughout the Bill, we are talking about deductions. They mean fines. When the Bill is on the statute book, the employer will have the right to fine his employee without getting or submitting any evidence.

We are talking about part-time or low-paid workers, and many employees who are not covered by trade unions. If an employee has the audacity to go to an industrial tribunal, to prove his innocence, there is nothing to stop the employer sacking the individual. It is not just the individual. There might be a stock deficiency or cash shortage in the till, and two, three or four employees might be sharing the till or looking after the stock. Under the Bill, the employer has the right to fine the four employees 10 per cent. of their salaries for the stock deficiency or cash shortage. That is what the Bill is about.

We must accept that, in the working class movement, we have one or two rascals who might steal from the till. But the Conservative party might have one or two reasonable Members to support our amendment.

However, if someone stole, the rest of his workmates could be fined by the employer. That is one of the reasons why we have tabled amendment No. 43, which will protect the employee against being sacked if he has the audacity to take his employer to an industrial tribunal, simply to prove his innocence. Under amendment No. 43, a worker may present a complaint to a tribunal "that the employer has not shown that the worker concerned was guilty of the act or omission complained of".

Under the Bill, the employer does not have to have any evidence. As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) said, there could be a deficiency because of a fault in the till. If the employer found a deficiency, he could fine all his employees 10 per cent. of their wages.

Amendment No. 44 concerns industrial tribunals. If the worker goes ahead and takes the chance of getting the sack from his employer by going to an industrial tribunal to prove his innocence, and if he proves himself innocent, the only thing that the employer is obliged to do is to give the employee the 10 per cent. of his wages that he previously stole. There is no recompense, compensation or expenses. My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham) made that point. I think that the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) will agree with this. At times, people from Newcastle have to go to Darlington for industrial tribunals, and vice versa. Because one works in Newcastle, that does not mean that the tribunal will sit in Newcastle. It might be in Jarrow, Langbaurgh or somewhere else.

[Mr. Dixon]

We are talking about employees, some of whom are receiving the princely sum of £57 a week. They will have to find the fares to go to the industrial tribunal, take time off work and take the chance of getting the sack. If they require a witness, the witness will have to be prepared to sacrifice his wages and pay expenses to prove the employee's innocence. That is what we are dealing with in part I. It is only the tip of the iceberg, I remind my hon. Friend the Member for Hillsborough.

I believe that our amendments Nos. 43 and 44 give some safeguards. They do not make the Bill more palatable for people who have any concern about low-paid workers or other employees, but at least it is better than what we have at the moment. I hope that the hon. Member for Langbaurgh and one or two of his colleagues who have listened to the debate will join us in the Lobby. Not one person has defended part I or clause 5. One would have thought that those who supported the Minister in Committee would defend him tonight, but not one has done so. The only contribution from Conservative Benches has been an attack on this part of the Bill. I hope that some Conservative Members will join us in the Lobby.

Mr. Trippier: We have had the opportunity to debate at length the principal issue behind the amendments, which is the deduction from wages. We had some interesting and long debates in Committee. Wherever possible, I have tried to meet the concern of some Opposition Members. There is evidence of that on the Order Paper because we shall move amendments aimed at doing that.

The amendments that we are now considering go too far. I do not want to drive a wedge between my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) and his new-found friendship with Opposition Members as a result of the debate thus far, but it seems to me to be absolutely extraordinary that there is more that divides them than unites them on this issue. First, Opposition Members who have spoken so far will agree that they are in favour of industrial tribunals. The hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) recognised their importance. My hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh does not like them at all. He has been consistent throughout——

Mr. Holt: I am happy to be chastised for what I am guilty of, but not for what I am not guilty of. If my hon. Friend cares to read my speech in December, he will see that I am in favour of industrial tribunals, but the completely reformed variety, which takes all the legalism out of it.

Mr. Trippier: All right. So we are getting a little clearer now. My hon. Friend is in favour of reformed industrial tribunals but in the main Opposition Members are in favour of industrial tribunals——

Ms. Clare Short rose——

Mr. Trippier: I shall happily give way to the hon. Lady. She knows I always do.

We should not try to find some new form of cemented relationship between Opposition Members and my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh on this issue. It is clear that Conservative Members and Opposition Members do not agree about industrial tribunals. We all know, if we were to put our hands on our hearts, that these tribunals protect the worker more than the employer in the vast majority of cases.

6.30 pm

Ms. Clare Short: The Opposition, and I assume the Minister, are in favour of the existence of industrial tribunals. However, we do not think that it is right that workers should be forced to go to industrial tribunals to get basic justice and to prove their innocence. We believe that there should be reasonable law and reasonable industrial practices.

The Opposition are worried—I believe that the hon. Member for Langbaurgh agrees with us on this—although there may be disagreement between the hon. Gentleman and the Opposition about part II of the Bill—about the increase in legalism, the use of lawyers and the high expense of going to industrial tribunals. The original intention of these tribunals was that they would provide a cheap and informal procedure.

Mr. Trippier: Industrial tribunals are cheap and informal procedures. I agree with the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) that industrial tribunals are good, although my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh does not appear to share that view. My hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh does not seem to believe in deductions; at least, that is what I understood from his speech. I presume that Opposition Members do not agree with the deductions either. That is very strange because the present legislation allows deductions to be made, conceivably up to a limit of 100 per cent. However, with this Bill we are building in added protection for the worker.

Opposition Members have suggested that the amendments we are considering will withdraw protection from the worker. That is not the case. Opposition Members have argued that the present legislation dating back to 1896 should continue. That is absolute nonsense. There is no logic in the argument that the present legislation should continue. It is clear from the first few clauses in this part of the Bill that we are desperately trying to protect the workers. We are especially trying to do that in relation to workers in the retail trade.

Part 1 of the Bill provides that deductions from wages or payments by workers to employers are lawful only if they are authorised by statute, by the contract of employment or by written agreement of the worker. No one has mentioned that last point so far in the debate.

Mr. Eastham: I did.

Mr. Trippier: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman, I could not have heard him say that.

In addition, there are special controls of deductions relating to cash shortages or stock deficiencies and the worker has a right to complain to a tribunal about an unlawful deduction. There should be such a right. We shall move the amendment today to strengthen those controls and to ensure that workers have a copy or a written explanation of the contractual terms authorising deductions. That point was drawn to my attention in Committee by the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar. The amendments will introduce a time limit on deductions relating to cash shortages or stock deficiencies and I readily accepted that point in Committee.

In Part 1 of the Bill, we already have a substantial body of controls based on the philosophy that it is best to allow the parties involved to sort out a regime for themselves to control deductions from wages, to ensure that the regime is clearly understood and enforced.

Dr. Godman: As the Minister will know, I was not a Member of the Standing Committee. However, I have been present throughout the debate today. The Minister used the phrase "added protection given to employees". How will the Minister publicise that protection? Will his Department produce and distribute a code of practice on that point?

Mr. Trippier: It is certainly our intention to increase awareness of the new proposals that will follow when the Bill reaches the statute book. In our Department, we consider ourselves to be pretty good at that. We will go to extreme lengths to ensure that people are aware of the new regime. That point was raised in Committee and I understand why the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) should wish to raise it again. We are anxious to increase awareness not only for employees but for employers. Any changes will obviously make significant differences to the running of firms.

Ms. Clare Short: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Trippier: I would like to deal with the specific point that the hon. Lady raised in her previous intervention. I shall deal with that point and then give way.

I must stress that 75 per cent. of cases which are intended to go to tribunals are settled before they reach a hearing. I understand that Opposition Members would always try to convince the House that it is more of a strain and inconvenience for workers to go to a tribunal than the employer. I can understand that and in some cases I believe that that is true. However, I have always argued that it is more of a strain on the employer. The evidence of the number of cases that are settled prior to an industrial tribunal bears that out.

I am also convinced from the consultation exercise that we undertook that the industrial tribunal is a disincentive to increasing employment in the private sector. I accept that my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh made that point in Committee. Private sector firms obviously do not want to suffer the hassle and trouble of going to an industrial tribunal.

I believe on balance that it is more of a disincentive to the employer than it is to the worker.

Mr. Eastham: I am sure that the Minister will recall that, when we made our observations on this clause in Committee, we contended that employers did not need to go to tribunals. They could simply go to the police. If the staff were found to be breaking the law there could be an inquiry and the employer could have recourse to a proper court of law. Such an action would not cost the Minister's Department anything.

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Gentleman has missed the point that I was trying to make in Committee. There are many instances in which an employer may choose to discipline a member of his work force but he may not wish to go to the extent of dismissing that member of staff. The member of staff may have committed an offence that would be punishable in a court of law. However, the employer might choose not to pick up the telephone and call the police and all that that means. The hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley must have known employers who are decent in that way and I am sure that many hon. Members have acted in a similar manner to give someone another chance. An employer may sometimes choose not to call in the law. However, he may want to exercise the disciplinary powers that are available in the contract. That point has not been made so far in the debate — the powers must be in the contract. All hon. Members, irrespective of political persuasion, should welcome the fact that in some instances matters do not have to be taken to the police.

Ms. Clare Short: I believe that it was the hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) who suggested in Standing Committee that ACAS might be asked to draw up a recommended contract covering the Minister's points. Speaking from memory, I believe that the Minister said that he thought that that was a useful suggestion and that he would consider it. That suggestion paralleled the proposal from my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) that there should be a code of practice. I hope that the Minister will proceed with that point and not forget it.

Mr. Trippier: That is a fair point to make. I seem to remember the exchange of views that we had on these matters in Committee, and I will certainly bear that point in mind. If I did not make it crystal clear, and if this point is not obvious in the Hansard record of the Committee, I will say that it would be a good idea to have a draft form of contract prepared by ACAS. That point should be made known to increase awareness.

Five principal issues are dealt with in this set of amendments and the new clause. First, it is proposed that all deductions for disciplinary purposes should be limited to 10 per cent. of gross wages.

Of course, the Government have introduced such limits to control deductions related to cash shortages and stock deficiencies, as that is the area of contemporary concern and abuse.

Mr. Mikardo: Rubbish.

Mr. Holt: If a pieceworker botches up an entire lot that he has been given to manufacture, whatever it is, will he still be paid 90 per cent. and have only a disciplinary stricture of 10 per cent.?

Mr. Trippier: My hon. Friend could not be more wrong. I assume that my hon. Friend is talking about a pieceworker in manufacturing industry, not in the retail business. If it is in the contract that deductions can be made, the Bill's provision to limit deductions to 10 per cent. on pay day will not apply. That does not apply outside the retail sector. I shall try to develop that.

The hon. Member for Bow and Poplar said, sotto voce, that it is rubbish that evidence shows that there is abuse. I must assure him that that is the case. In the consultation exercise, to which I referred on a number of occasions in Committee, the evidence was clear. The hon. Gentleman gave the House examples of what could happen in certain instances, but there is no evidence that that has proved to be a problem. But, trying to be reasonable, as I have endeavoured to be with the hon. Gentleman throughout, if there were evidence that that was causing concern, obviously I would look at it. Incidentally, the situation that he described exists at the moment under the present law. I am sure that he understands that. I cannot put it any clearer. We are changing that situation but still building in the protection for the worker.

Mr. Mikardo: As we are legislating we should improve conditions and there is no improvement here. Under the present law and under the Bill, I repeat, a worker can have a deduction made for a shortage that does not exist or for a shortage that does exist for which he is not in the least responsible. What sort of a condition is that? Why are we not legislating to get rid of that gross injustice?

Mr. Trippier: As I have said, and as I know that the hon. Gentleman will recognise, we have tried desperately in the Bill to strike a fair balance. We must recognise on the one hand that employers who are concerned about cash deficiencies and stock shortages will not take on more people unless they have the power to deduct. Many would say that, rather than press ahead with running a business which is so much of an encumbrance and becoming incredibly bureaucratic, thanks to the Government introducing so much legislation which acts as a brake on enterprise, they will not go ahead. They will pack up. If they have any money left they will invest it in gilt-edged stocks in the stock exchange.

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Trippier: I am desperately trying to get on. I have allowed a number of interventions.

The hon. Member for Bow and Poplar referred to the Lord Chief Justice. The situation that the hon. Gentleman described is exactly the same. If the employer is to have the right of making deductions from pay taken away from him, he will not take on more workers. That is a lifeline for those businesses that are dealing with cash. We have given all sorts of examples of garage forecourts, cigarette kiosks and so on. If those who operate such businesses —hon. Members should be glad of them because they are serious employers—do not have the right to make deductions, they will simply say that because of the problems that they have experienced—there is evidence of them—they will simply not carry on running such businesses. That is the sad and tragic alternative.

I still say that it is better to leave disciplinary procedures and general limits on disciplinary deductions to be determined between employers, workers and trade unions, again short of dismissing people. That is a good alternative. Under the Bill, a worker suffering a disciplinary deduction can complain to a tribunal if he has not agreed or consented to it and if it was not provided for in his contract. That is surely sufficient protection.

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): The Minister mentioned industrial tribunals and the fact that workers can go to them. He must know that a tribunal can award against an employee going to it if it feels that the claim was not justified. Therefore, the Minister is not giving the full facts to the House when he says that a person can go to an industrial tribunal, when he knows that if he goes along that particular road he runs a risk of having to pay the employer's costs, legal fees and whatever other expenses have been incurred.

Mr. Trippier: I know that the hon. Gentleman would never wittingly seek to mislead the House, but he must make it clear that the number of instances where that has arisen are minuscule. To comply with the law as it is now —nothing to do with the Truck Acts—that complaint must be frivolous or vexatious. Only a handful of people have been treated in that way and both of us should be glad about that. However, the evidence that I have brought to the House today that 75 per cent. of claims are settled outside a tribunal is more compelling than anything I have heard from the Opposition.

Mr. Holt: My hon. Friend must realise that what he is doing will affect many millions of people for many years. We are talking at this moment about industrial tribunals and vexatious or frivolous aspects. Most of the cases where the appellant has been found guilty by the "tribunal" and forced to pay have been where there has been a pre-hearing assessment which has gone against the appellant but the appellant has nevertheless proceeded with the case to tribunal. I have not heard whether the pre-hearing assessment scene will be introduced into this and whether, if an employee feels that he has been unjustly treated, there will be a pre-hearing assessment. I have not read of it in any of that in the Bill.

Mr. Trippier: The simple answer is that it will be. There has to be a pre-hearing assessment and my hon. Friend is right to refer to it. That will be broadly welcomed. It is perhaps a little amazing that we did not discuss that at some length in Committee, but we did not. My hon. Friend is right and I am glad to give him that assurance.

As I said, a balance must be struck. The more employees and workers are tied up in statutory controls, limiting what they can agree to in their contract, the more likely it is that employers will be reluctant to take on workers or will resort to dismissals rather than deductions.

The balance is about right in the Bill, given that we are proposing some amendments which have been brought forward in a real attempt to meet the concerns expressed by Opposition Members. That I am anxious to do, but I strongly recommend that the House rejects these amendments.

Ms. Clare Short: In the spirit of the strange love-hate relationships that are developed in Committee stages, may I pay the Minister an inverted compliment by saying that he is not at his best today.

The Minister said that the Government were trying desperately to protect workers. That is just not true. The consensus is that the Truck Acts have inadequacies but provided better protection than what is being put in their place. The Minister's only argument—I do not believe it—is that employers say that if they are not given more powers to deduct pay, they will not take on more workers. I challenge the Minister to provide me with any evidence of his claim that employers have told the Department of Employment, "We can't take on any more workers unless we have more powers to deduct."

Employers have powers under existing law to deduct up to 100 per cent. of wages. Under the Bill they may deduct up to 100 per cent. of wages except in relation to stock shortages or cash defficiencies in the retail sector. The Minister cannot pretend that the Bill improves protection.

Mr. Trippier: I was not arguing that employers were saying that they should have wider powers to make deductions. We all agree that they have considerable powers at the moment. We are restricting those powers by limiting deductions in the retail sector to 10 per cent. We believe that it is abhorrent that workers could face deductions that were so substantial that their net take-home pay would be next to nothing. We believe that to be immoral; that is why we are introducing the legislation.

Ms. Short: As long as Hansard is not interfered with, it will show tomorrow what the Minister said. I wrote down his words as he said them, because this is the first time that he has introduced the argument. I do not believe his claim and my challenge stands. He said, "Employers will not take on more people unless they have power to deduct."

Employers already have the power to deduct money from workers' wages. The Government must justify their legislation, and part of the Minister's justification was to say that employers throughout the land were knocking at his door saying that they could not take on more workers unless they had the power to deduct money from their wages. I do not believe that employers have said that to the Minister.

The Minister suggested that a balance had to be struck, and we agree with him. However, the balance in the Truck Acts was a much fairer and more just balance. The balance struck in the Bill is grossly unjust. Workers who are not guilty of any dishonesty and may even be able to prove that they are not guilty of dishonesty may be subject to deductions and fines. The only way for them to clear their reputation, let alone get their money back, is for them to lose time and money in going to an industrial tribunal. We have just heard that there is to be a pre-hearing assessment, which will mean two days off work instead of one.

Even if workers prove to a tribunal that they were innocent of any act or omission leading to a loss, but their contract states that they may be subject to a deduction if there is a loss, the tribunal will not be able to reverse the deduction. If the workers win, they will get back only the money deducted from their wages. There will be no compensation for the cost of going to the tribunal and no compensation for the hurt and damage to the characters of those who are accused of being liars. In addition, the employer will have the right to dismiss workers whom he has not employed for at least two years or five years—depending on whether they are employed full-time or part-time—if he is aggrieved by the fact that they took him to a tribunal.

The Bill is an outrage. It is unjust and it will lead to more deductions and fines in the worst organised sectors of our work force. It will also lead to increased conflict and a greater sense of injustice. The Minister should have left the old law alone if he could do no better than this Bill. We reject this part of the Bill and I hope that all my hon. Friends and decent Conservative Members will vote for the new clause.

New Clause 10

PAYMENT IN CASH

'No worker who is currently paid in cash shall cease to be so paid without his or her consent.'.—[Mr. Eastham.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Eastham: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 53, in Clause 11, page 11, line 40, at end insert 'except that no worker currently paid in cash shall cease to be so paid without agreement'.

Mr. Eastham: By moving new clause 10 and discussing with it amendment No. 53, the Opposition are attempting to amend clause 11. I preface my remarks by saying that we recognise that millions of workers who are paid by cheque through their banks find it a completely satisfactory method. We do not propose to change that procedure. All we say is that workers should be given a choice.

The Bill gives employers all the options. The employee has virtually no say about the way in which he shall be paid. The Bill deals not with highly paid workers but with the lowest paid. It affects 2,750,000 workers. A total of 41 per cent. of workers covered by wages councils are below the European decent wage threshold. Four out of five workers in wages council industries are women. Often people say that women work just for pin money, but that is not so. Low-paid workers are desperately in need of their jobs and reasonable pay.

In our earlier debate we reminded the Minister that the Government are turning the clock back more than 150 years to the time of the Truck Acts. They were introduced to counter the dishonesty, greed and malpractices of some employers. If the Government have their way I fervently believe that once again corruption will occur. We say not that all employers are corrupt or bad, but that some are unscrupulous and must be controlled by legislation.

On Second Reading the Minister tried to justify taking away payments in cash. He said that better security would result. That is a fact. Security will be greater because no cash handling will be involved. The Minister said that employers would save up to 50p per payment if transactions went through the banks. The employer will save money, but no consideration has been given to providing matching benefits for the employee.

In the two and a half months that we considered the Bill in Committee, we were furnished with numerous documents. One of them was from the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux dealing with this aspect of the Bill. It is not a political organisation and it is therefore fair to quote some of its comments. It has an unbiased opinion in the interest of the people to whom we are referring.

The document states:

"In 1984-85 the Citizens Advice Bureaux service dealt with over 6 million enquiries: of these, 600,000 related to employment problems. A substantial proportion of employment enquiries concerned deductions from pay, non-cash wages and low pay."

Dealing directly with the right to be paid in cash the document continues:

"Citizens Advice Bureaux deal with a considerable number of people working in low-paid employment and dependent upon weekly cash wages. Many such people are unable to open a bank or building society account and even if it were possible they would find the cost of running such an account prohibitive . . . employees should retain the option to be paid in cash."

The document makes some further worthy observations. It states:

"Bureaux throughout the country have urged us to repeat the recommendation made in our original evidence paper for all employees to have the option to be paid in cash. Bureaux' experience has shown that serious practical problems do arise for people on low incomes when they no longer receive their wages in cash."

7.15 pm

The main points made by the bureaux are as follows:

"As a matter of principle, . . . all employees should be free to use the method of payment best suited to their needs. Many CAB clients do not have a bank account and few have post office savings or building society accounts. A direct change to payment into one of these can cause particular difficulties.

Those who have had problems in the past with regard to credit and are perhaps on a black list, may not be able to open a bank account. Many clients, particularly in rural areas, do not have any easy access to banks, post offices and building societies. They may be far away and only open during working hours.

Many clients without accounts have experienced hardship because of the difficulty in trying to cash cheques or crossed giros . . . The cost of getting to and from the place where cash can be drawn may be high . . .

In several cases salary cheques have not been met when presented for encashment because the employer did not have sufficient cash in his account. This can be costly for the employee who will be charged for a returned cheque and consequently may incur additional bank charges. In addition an employee will suffer hardship if wages are not received on time.

There may also be some delays between payment being made by cheque and it being cleared, which can cause hardship . . .

Some clients would have difficulty in operating a bank account. People on low incomes may depend upon cash-in-hand to maintain their budget and earn too little to allow flexibility.

In cases where transition to credit transfer has been made employees may be forced to move from weekly to monthly payments. Where the employer does not make provision for the change, the effect upon the household budget can be drastic. The attitude shown by banks towards credit can push people on low incomes into debt; there are two aspects of this:

The ease with which credit can be obtained has forced many clients into debt, often for the first time.

Banks may take unfair advantage of their creditor status and may make direct deductions for overdraft and loans. This can cause hardship, especially to those trying to clear several debts."

Those are some of the submissions and objections expressed by citizens advice bureaux throughout the country. They make a logical and compelling case and support our belief that the worker should be allowed to choose.

One or two points have not yet been mentioned in the debate. It is not uncommon for mistakes to be made in wage calculations, whether computerised or manual. Employees paid in cash can go to the wages office and have the mistake rectified immediately. The cashier will usually hand over any deficiency in the pay packet. If employees are now to be paid by bank transfer, it will take time to authorise an additional payment to rectify a mistake, and that will cause problems for employees.

It is worth emphasising that some worker groups, especially the low paid, are not familiar with banking methods and may find it difficult to keep tabs on their bank statements. Low-paid workers may not be as conscious of deficiencies in their wages. In Committee, the Minister admitted that wages inspectors had discovered underpayments of £11·9 million over a five-year period. He hastened to add that 80 per cent. of that had been retrieved. However, the number of wages inspectors is to be reduced by as much as 50 per cent., so I fear that underpayments will not be discovered and retrieved.

There is a possibility—even a probability—of further and greater underpayment as a result of the banking method that workers are to have forced upon them.

Mr. Holt: The hon. Gentleman is becoming thoroughly confused when talking about underpayments and mistakes in calculations. The anomalies that the wages inspectors found were deliberate underpayments by employers and contraventions of wages councils' rules. Mistakes in calculation computing do not total £11·9 million.

Mr. Eastham: Whether it is a mistake in calculation or a deliberate underpayment, the suffering is the same for low-paid workers. I am concerned not about the reason for any deficiency, but about workers receiving their full entitlement.

Mr. Nellist: When genuine mistakes are made in the wages of workers in wages councils industries, where employees are paid weekly in cash, they are put right within a week. The system proposed in the Bill allows employers to use monthly bank transfers, so mistakes would take a month to rectify.

Mr. Eastham: My hon. Friend is correct. We are talking about workers earning only £55, £65 or £75 a week, when the average weekly manual wage is £165 or £170 a week.

Mr. Holt: With respect, we are not talking about that. It does not help the hon. Gentleman's case to make false statements. This legislation covers everyone's cash payment up to any figure—it does not cover only low-paid workers. The hon. Gentleman must please get this right.

Mr. Eastham: I accept that the Bill covers all manual workers, but I am emphasising the position of the low-paid. Hardship is greater among them than among those earning £160 or £170 a week. We must concentrate our attention on that.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) said, the switch from weekly to monthly pay will be agonising for some groups of workers. The difficulty will be compounded because of low wages and the difficulty of even trying to earn a living. All fair-minded people must be concerned about the effects of the Bill, and especially about this clause which will cause extreme hardship to the low paid.

Mr. Caborn: Does my hon. Friend agree that many shift workers, especially those paid late on a Friday night, will find the proposed system very difficult? Currently they receive cash in the hand, which they can give to their wives for the week-end shopping.

Does my hon. Friend further agree that no one—the trade unions, industry, the CBI or the banks—wants the course proposed in the Bill? Does it not show the illiteracy of the Government in dealing with industry?

Mr. Eastham: My hon. Friend is correct in all that he says. The Minister said in Committee that facilities were available for those who were unable to get to the bank before it closed. He said that, for example, they could go to the Post Office. However, the Post Office has now said that a charge of 50p will be made to cash cheques on a Saturday morning. People may be faced with all sorts of charges when trying to obtain their wages. At present, a worker receives his pay packet on pay day and he faces no charges. Conservative Members may say that free banking is available provided one stays in credit, but there is no guarantee that the banks will not change their policy. A banking crisis might result in a charge of 25p for every withdrawal, which will mean that the low paid will suffer a wage reduction.

It seems that the Government are intent on giving rights only to employers. Employers will be able to tell their workers, "From next month you will be paid through the bank, and not in cash." A worker's bank may be 12 miles from his village, he might find that after six months he incurs bank charges in obtaining his wages and the employer may decide to introduce monthly pay instead of weekly pay. There is no provision in the clause to oblige the employer to make compensatory allowances to tide over the worker who is to receive no wages for three weeks. Employees are being denied a choice, and that is why we have tabled the clause.

7.30 pm

The Bill deteriorates clause by clause. It is a Robin-Hood-in-reverse Bill. The Government are seeking to rob the poor to give to the rich. The emphasis is in one direction, and certainly not towards employees. For these reasons, I hope that the House will support the clause.

Mr. Gordon Oakes (Halton): I support strongly the arguments advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham). It is a modest new clause. The Bill — especially clause 11, which will abolish the Truck Acts—will cause heartbreak in many tens of thousands of families. In working-class households there is something almost mystical about the pay packet. The employee has worked for the week, and has worked hard. He has put in his hours and as a reward he receives the coin of the realm in a packet. The pay packet has a great significance to many working-class families. The new clause does not provide that all workers should be entitled to payment in cash. It provides merely that those who have been paid in coin of the realm throughout their working lives shall continue to be paid in that way if they so desire.

I have no doubt that the Government will say that there are many anomalies in the Truck Acts, some of which go back to 1831. That may be. It may be right that the anomalies should be ironed out, but we must not throw away the baby with the bath water, which is what the Government are trying to do in clause 11.

My hon. Friend the Member for Coventry South-East (Mr. Nellist) talked about the pay packet and mistakes or otherwise, but I do not wish to talk about the employer who tries deliberately to mislead and to defraud his employee. Let us say that a mistake is made by someone in the accounting department and a man or a woman receives the wrong wages. When the employee receives his pay packet, he will open it and read the statement. If there is an error, he will be in the pay office within 10 minutes of receiving the pay packet. He will not be able to do that at the end of the month when he receives his bank statement, and he may well be in that position as a result of the Bill.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): I am not clear how monthly payments have come to feature in the debate. There is nothing in the Bill to suggest that payments will be made monthly. Surely it is open to an employer to pay weekly or monthly.

Mr. Oakes: I have never suggested that the employee will be paid monthly. I do not know the hon. Gentleman's bank, but I receive a monthly statement. I am never supplied with a weekly statement. I have no doubt that I would be supplied with a weekly statement if I requested it, but it would be necessary to ask specifically for that arrangement. The banks will not want the scheme that is envisaged in the Bill if it will involve the issuing of weekly statements.

Ms. Clare Short: Experience and practice tells us that when employers move to cashless pay they seek to move also to monthly pay. That is the way in which employers move in the real world. That has been the experience in retailing and local government, for example. Employers do this because they can make two sets of savings at the same time.

Mr. Oakes: Yes, that is practice and experience in the real world. Unfortunately the Government do not understand the real world and what happens in it.

In many areas — I have no doubt that what I am about to say will be endorsed by my hon. Friends the Members for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry), for Wigan (Mr. Stott), and for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short), and by many Conservative Members — it is traditional for a man, especially an older working man, to take his pay packet home and give it to his wife. There is nothing sexist about that. The man does so because his wife is the controller of the household. She will know how much she has to pay for children's shoes and she knows the price of meat, for example. She has to plan and to budget, poor woman. The man merely hands over his pay packet. Imagine what the position will be when that pattern of a lifetime changes and the man returns to his wife and says, "I have no pay packet. My money is in the bank."

The Truck Acts were designed to protect the worker against employers' abuses. They prevented employers and their pals paying in the form of tokens that could be exchanged only in shops owned by them, their brothers or their brothers-in-law. The Government may say that that can no longer happen, but it can. Banks can exploit their customers, and they can do so mercilessly. If a bank account is opened by someone who has never had one previously, I have no doubt that the bank will invite him or her to have a credit card. It will say, "You are entitled to a credit card and perhaps you would like to apply for one." It may even supply one gratuitously.

I attended a lecture last week at which a distinguished theologian was talking about the modern world. She made a good point about credit cards being a misnomer. They are debt cards, not credit cards. Those who supply the cards want the holders to get into debt; they do not give them anything. Think of the misery that can be created by someone who is not used to the credit card system. He or she might well be used to having cash in the cupboard to pay the rates or the rent. Suddenly this individual is given unlimited finance through a credit card. The Government cannot say that the banks do not do this because we know that they do. My hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) has a thick dossier on the banks' treatment of students. They advance ludicrous sums to students who are receiving only a pittance in the form of grants. These ludicrous sums cannnot possibly be repaid. I have no doubt that the banks would treat ordinary working people in the same way.

If the Paymaster General or I live some distance from a bank and we find on arrival that the cash till is closed and it is necessary to go to the next branch, or if we find that there is no dispenser from which we can obtain cash on a Saturday or Sunday, we can drive to a branch where we know that there is a cashpoint. The ordinary working person we are talking about will not have a car. He will not be able to travel as easily as the right hon. and learned Gentleman or myself to a branch where there is a cash dispenser.

This is a retrograde step. The Truck Acts were intended to defend the right of working people to be paid what they had earned in the coin of the realm. The Government claim to believe in choice, but they are denying workers the choice to be paid in real money. I envisage endless difficulties resulting from the repeal of the Truck Acts. I envisage much hardship in many homes because many people will not understand that the pattern of a lifetime has been changed.

Nobody wants change. Neither employers, the banks nor trade unions want it. The Government will listen to nobody. They insist on pushing the change through in the face of universal opposition. The Under-Secretary of State for Employment represents a constituency in the north-west. He should know how things work in working-class households. I hope that the Paymaster General, whose roots are in the working class—his is a significant title in this context—will realise that this is the wrong way in which to treat working people.

Mr. Trippier: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way and I appreciate that he referred to my right hon. and learned Friend and me in pleasant terms. Does he not know that he is absolutely wrong to say that employers do not want the Bill? Even ICI, which is represented in his constituency at Blackley, cannot wait for it to be enacted——

Ms. Clare Short: The employers want it.

Mr. Trippier: It is not a case of money for them. They are sick to the back teeth of robberies of the cash that is brought through the factory gates. Many employers want the Bill.

Mr. Oakes: I can understand that some employers do not like paying a security firm to bring the wages in. We should take account of that, but we should also take account of the working person's right to be paid in real money. The employee should be able to choose whether to put the money in the bank. Many people dislike banks. If hon. Members do not believe me, they should consider how many families put their savings in a building society. Building societies are open when people are out shopping. When people are off work, the banks are shut. They cannot go in and argue. They can use cashpoints if there are any and they are working, but they might be miles away.

I ask the Paymaster General to think again and to exercise his office.

Mr. Holt: Throughout the Committee stage, I have been fairly consistent in my inconsistency with my own side. When I talk to people, I discover that they find the House of Commons a strange place. They consider that it is noisy, that people do not debate properly, that items are introduced for discussion but that hon. Members go off at a tangent. I therefore thought that I would find out what the Opposition had done on this matter. They have learnt from their lesson upstairs. An amendment which we debated in Committee proposed that all wages and salaries should be paid in money. The Opposition have obviously listened and learnt as they have now brought forward a much more reasonable amendment.

Ms. Clare Short: The point of that amendment was about the Truck Acts and whether people are paid in kind. It was not about cash. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is aware that there were other amendments.

Mr. Holt: I am sorry that I have to withdraw the credit that I was giving the Opposition.

It is easy to pass legislation that is favoured by a small number of large firms and which will have a direct bearing on the daily lives of many people. Payment in cash is intrinsic to English working life, and has been for as long as I can remember. It is not unreasonable to suggest that it should continue unless people consent to change. To lose that right as a result of arbitrary Government action is not very good.

I understand the Government's argument that we are in the technical age of the computer and that everything can be done differently, but being paid in cash is desperately important to many people. I fear that, if everybody is paid by bank credit transfer, overdrafts will become the norm rather than a rarity and that many people will get themselves into debts which they will never be able to get out of. By abolishing the worker's right to be paid in cash, the Government are abolishing the discipline that the worker imposes on himself because he knows that he cannot spend more than the cash in the pay packet.

When customers come into one of my establishments, they pay in cash. My staff are frequently asked for a little credit, but they know that they will be fired if they give it. Amazingly enough, the cash always turns up. The Government would do well to heed the new clause. It does not preclude a shift from cash payment by consent. That element of consent should be considered closely, as it is not unknown for trade unions to negotiate such a right away, although the worker may not agree with it and might be disadvantaged as a result.

Mistakes in pay packets have been mentioned. If pay is short, the employee quickly knows and nips down to the wages office to get it rectified. If there is an overpayment which is discovered but not declared, the employee is guilty of theft and can be taken to court. It might not be so easy to assess whether the pay is right from a computer printout, but an employee who inadvertently keeps £22 when he is entitled to only £21 is still guilty of theft. The Bill could lead more people into that trap. The change has not been asked for—indeed, many people say that they do not want it—and it is unnecessary. Only a few people want it.

The Government have impaled themselves on trying to do something unnecessary by imposition when it could have been done by persuasion. I am sure that most people could eventually be persuaded that it is not unreasonable to be paid in a form other than cash. It is unnecessarily harsh, however, to take the right away by law. That is especially true for the people in the north of England, such as my constituents, who are used to cash and unused to computer printouts. Perhaps the two systems could run in parallel for a while. But to enshrine it in law that an employer—against the wishes of all his employees, or a majority, or even a significant minority, of them—can remove their rights will do the Government's reputation no good.

Mr. Pendry: The Government are the only people to be out of step on this measure. The Minister visited ICI Gillingham and assumed that ICI Blackley and everyone else took a similar view, but almost everyone is against the measure. My right hon. Friend the Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes) made the point with which I wished to begin. We have been told for years that the Conservative party is the party of choice. The new clause follows that principle. The Opposition are giving the people the opportunity to choose.

Some of my colleagues may not agree with me, but I believe that people should be paid by cheque. That is common sense. I have done exactly what the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) said, although I did not remove the rights of my trade union members. When I was a union official, I negotiated many agreements whereby workers were paid by cheque. It was always done by consent, because it was a democratic decision. We always negotiated agreements whereby the workers got something in return for giving away that right. Some did not wish to do it, and their rights were observed.

The Conservative party seems to have lost its connection with the rural worker. Two examples taken at random—Ryedale and West Derbyshire—show that the Government are out of touch with the circumstances of the rural worker. He does not have a banking network and, because of the Conservative policy of closing rural post offices, he often must travel miles to the nearest post office.

We must live in the practical world, about which we hear from only one Conservative Member—the hon. Member for Langbaurgh. Although we do not always agree with him, and he does not always follow his comments by voting in our Lobby, from time to time he talks practical common sense. That is what my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham) meant when he talked about citizens advice bureaux being at the sharp end. Those are practical examples of what happens in our society.

Although I agree that, for safety and many other reasons, people should be paid by cheque, it should be done by negotiation and with consent. That is what the new clause says, and I am surprised that the Conservative party does not wish to be associated with its spirit.

Mr. Nellist: The Truck Acts, which the new clause would in part retain, give workers the right to be paid in cash. The Paymaster General recently described that method of payment as archaic and anachronistic. He meant that protection is not needed in his perception of modern-day Britain.

Most of the people who will be affected if the Bill is passed unamended will be lower-paid workers. They have the most to lose from such a transfer. All the costs of shifting from cash pay to bank transfer, and from weekly to monthly payments, will be borne by the workers, and all the benefits will be gained by the employers. It has been estimated that, especially in large companies, when the transfer to a banking system rather than a cash system is run through the Bankers' Automated Clearing Services Ltd—the chairman of the Conservative party has put the benchmark on that—every change would cut costs by £30 a person per year. In Committee, we heard some examples from Sheffield city council and British Telecom, which estimated savings of £31 and £35 per person respectively.

That will not be a one-off saving to the company, but an accrued saving every year. When the change from cash to bank payment is coupled with the change from weekly to monthly payment, especially in large companies, employers will effectively borrow workers' wages for four weeks, and leave it in their bank accounts to attract interest before paying it to the workers who have earned it. If workers are paid in arrears, the problem becomes worse.

I disagree with some of my comrades about the position of banks. I have just discovered that 7 million workers are paid in cash and that only half of them have bank accounts. The high street banks, considering the prospect of 3·5 million new accounts, must welcome this legislation because of the extra profits that those accounts would generate.

Ms. Clare Short: The briefing from the banking information service states that banks have not pressed for the repeal of the Truck Acts. They said in previous documents that they did not want customers by compulsion. That is their position on the record.

Mr. Nellist: I accept that they say that they do not want customers by compulsion, but, faced with the possibility of 3·5 million new customers, they must welcome the legislation.

The clause would create many disbenefits and difficulties for workers. In Committee, we were told that there would be fewer muggings and robberies and more security, but cash can be stolen only once. A cash card or cheque book, once stolen, can be used many times. I question whether there would be more security for workers. We have heard about the difficulty of access to banks, especially in rural areas, the difficulty of opening a bank account, the fact that those aged under 18 would not normally be given cheque guarantee cards, the difficulties of workers with literacy and language problems and the danger of delays in cheques being transferred into the bank.

A law centre brought to my attention the case of a worker paid by bank transfer who had an overdraft. The money coming from his firm was poured down the black hole of the overdraft and he had no money on which to live. He was not entitled to supplementary benefit because he was receiving a wage, so he had to rely on charity handouts to buy food for his family.

The movement from weekly to monthly pay would pose many problems for workers in bridging the gap between surviving on weekly pay and having to wait perhaps two or three weeks before the cycle of monthly pay comes round. On bank charges, the Minister said in Committee that almost every bank operates free banking. That is often true only if an account is in credit—in some cases in credit by £100. For many workers, £100 is two weeks' wages. It may not be much to Tory Members on hundreds of thousands of pounds a year. Hon. Members smile. The hon. Member for Brighton and Hove (Mr. Sainsbury) and his brother and father net £160,000 a week from their ownership of the grocery chain Sainsburys. They can keep their bank accounts in £100 credit and not incur bank charges. It is rather different for those who work for such a grocery chain and who are paid only £50 a week.

I do not have enough time to read out a letter from a full-time official of the Transport and General Workers Union in Coventry detailing the problems in the factories in Coventry, especially for the workers on piecework. Earlier, I said that if a mistake is made in a weekly wage packet, the worker can run to the wages office and get a payment on the Thursday or Friday afternoon to compensate. If he is paid monthly, he will have to wait for at least a month to have the mistake rectified. In the factories in Coventry, and no doubt in the few manufacturing centres that are left after seven years of Tory Government, some workers still carry out piecework or work on bonus schemes. The variations in their wages, which are calculated in the wages office, could cause problems on a monthly basis.

Time does not permit me to raise points about the National Union of Tailors and Garment Workers and the difficulties which its women workers in rural areas are experiencing. They cannot shop on a Friday night because, by the time they finish work, the banks and building societies are shut. I received a letter from the district secretary of the Tailors and Garment Workers in Belfast informing me that the banks shut between 12.30 pm and 1.30 pm in the city. How are workers supposed to go out during their lunch break and collect money from a bank, if the legislation is passed? But I cannot cover all those details in my short speech tonight.

Many workers have negotiated the right to transfer to a monthly or bank transfer. Coventry city health authority made a once-and-for-all £30 payment to workers for that. In Leicester, Marconi increased the status of manual workers to staff status. In Southwark, that meant that staff were entitled to London weighting worth £6.20 a week. Leeds council provided more holidays. In those cases trade unions, having discussed the matter and probably having balloted their members, negotiated a transfer of payments.

If this provision is unamended by new clause 10, it will remove that choice from working people, and at the end of the day many workers will be out of pocket. I hope that all my comrades will support the new clause and that the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt), who spent three months in Committee parading his conscience before us, as he has done tonight, and then sat on his hands and registered a No vote, will also support the new clause tonight and put his money where his mouth is.

Mr. Caborn: I wish to raise two important points which have been omitted from the debate.

I have received serious representations from ethnic minorities, including the Sheffield Asian Welfare Association. They say that they will face new difficulties if cashless pay is agreed to. Because of the Government's attitude toward immigrants, they are afraid, and have great difficulty registering with an authority. If the Government are not prepared to accept the new clause, and if cashless pay is agreed to, it will have a major effect on our ethnic minorities. Therefore, I ask the Government seriously to consider accepting new clause 10. It is reasonable.

People who have been dealing with the trade union side of industry have agreed that we would all like to move toward cashless pay, but without being forced to do so. I hope that the Government will take that advice from industry. The Minister has been able to mention only one company which is in favour of this proposal—ICI. Even the CBI is against it. I suggest that the Minister should bear that in mind when he replies.

Mr. Holt: The hon. Gentleman has raised one matter which has not so far been mentioned, and I hope that the Paymaster-General will deal with it when he replies. In talking about ethnic minorities and the abolition of the Truck Acts, we are talking about payment in the coin of the realm. There is a possibility that ethnic employers will pay in ethnic money which can then be exchanged only at ethnic shops and through ethnic banks. It will not be against the law for employers to pay in that way. The Government are opening that door by abolishing the Truck Acts without concerning themselves with the coin of the realm.

Mr. Caborn: I had not taken that point on board, and the Minister should consider it when he replies.

The Paymaster General and Minister for Employment (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I have never before had the pleasure of listening to the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham) speak from the Opposition Front Bench. It may be that this is his first time, and I congratulate him on that. I should like to have begun by replying to him on a new clause or amendment which I could accept on behalf of the Government, but I am afraid that in urging this new clause he is on a somewhat ill-conceived mission.

Several hon. Members have mentioned that this part of the Bill repeals a provision which was first introduced by the Truck Act 1831. In a speech during the last debate, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) was a little critical of my, apparently, scornful views of the legislation, and the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) reminded me that I had described the legislation on Second Reading as archaic. Like any good Conservative, I treat old legislation with suitable veneration, and the fact that the first Truck Act was passed in 1831 is, in itself, not a reason for repealing it.

The description of the Truck Acts given today, confirms my impression that the trade union and labour movement is extremely old-fashioned and backward-looking. Its veneration for a slowly vanishing society can sometimes be taken to extremes. I shall illustrate that first by reminding the House of the basis of the Truck Act 1831, which remains the basis of the present law until this Bill repeals it.

As many hon. Members will know from their modern history lessons in school, the origins of the Truck Act go back to the pernicious system that sprang up in the early 19th century when some labourers began to be paid in truck instead of in cash. It usually took the form of tokens, which could be cashed only at a company shop, and, obviously, the company could dictate the price of the goods exchanged for the tokens. That is the basis of the legislation, and it has dictated the form of legislation which has come down to us 150 years later. The provision about which hon. Members have been speaking provides that manual workers have the right to insist on payment in cash.

All hon. Members will appreciate that a great deal has happened since 1831.

Ms. Short: So that no one is misled, may I tell the House that the most recent relevant legislation is the Payment of Wages Act 1960?

Mr. Clarke: That was when the measure was last consolidated. The right of manual workers to be paid in cash has come indirectly through various subsequent provisions from the Truck Act 1831.

A great deal has changed since then. First, the business of paying in truck has ceased to be a social problem. Secondly, we no longer make the distinction between manual and non-manual workers for most pay purpóses. In both cases we expect the important aspects of pay and remuneration to be decided by agreement and discussion and, where necessary, by contract. There is no distinction between the way in which manual and non-manual workers arrive at agreements over important matters, such as rates of pay, bonuses, overtime rates and holiday entitlement. The law is the same for both manual and non-manual workers, except that manual workers have the right to insist on being paid in cash. That has meant that some employers and trade unions have found that where there is a desire to consider non-cash payment for manual workers, a handful of people, who insist on their legal rights to be paid in cash, can hold up and prevent the whole transition.

For non-manual work we have seen all sorts of non-cash payments which are fringe benefits and much coveted by others, such as company cars. It would be illegal to give them to manual workers because it would be in breach of the Truck Acts, which are being so passionately defended. On the other hand, a manual worker can insist on payment in cash.

Mr. Nellist: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Clarke: Both the hon. Members for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) and for Blackley appear to imagine that they are talking about the low paid. The law which they are defending has nothing to do with the low paid. Many low-paid workers are not protected by the Truck Acts and are exposed to this misery and hold this great grievance.

Mr. Nellist: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Clarke: I will in a second.

This provision, which is being defended so eloquently, is of benefit only to manual workers—the labourers of 19th century England who had its protection. Shop assistants are not protected by it.

Ms. Short: They are.

Mr. Clarke: Shop workers are not.

Ms. Short: Yes, they are.

Mr. Clarke: I am open to correction, and if the hon Lady has found an authority, obviously I shall look at it. I understand that the whole provision depends on the definition of manual and non-manual workers. Clerical workers or shop assistants are not protected — [Interruption.]. There are plenty of low-paid non-manual workers who are not protected by the Truck Acts. No non-manual worker has ever lobbied me to extend the benefits of the Truck Acts in order to protect him from the fearful exploitation to which Opposition Members believe that he will be exposed.

Ms. Clare Short: I refer the right hon. and learned Gentleman to the Library briefing. That says that in 1896 shop assistants were brought within the protection offered by the Acts.

Mr. Clarke: Perhaps I could see the Library briefing, as I am not sure that the hon. Lady is very certain of her facts. But if she is right, I shall accept that correction. I have not looked up the authorities, but I should be surprised if shop assistants were included in the definition of manual workers to be paid in truck.

Ms. Clare Short: I shall give the Minister the briefing.

Mr. Nellist: Will the Minister give way now, while he is reading the briefing?

Mr. Clarke: I see that shop workers are included for the purposes of deductions for fines, damaged goods, materials or services. The right to be paid in cash does not extend to shop workers. It extends to manual workers. A well-paid manual worker digging a ditch and earning £150 to £200 a week—and plenty of manual workers are paid that much—is covered by the Truck Acts. However, a shop assistant or clerical worker—I am on very sound ground when it comes to clerical workers—who is paid £40 or £50 a week is not protected by the legislation.

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Clarke: A low-paid clerical worker has never come to me demanding the protection of the Truck Acts.

Mr. Oakes: Will the Minister address himself to the new clause, which says:

"No worker who is currently paid in cash shall cease to be so paid without his or her consent."

We are not asking for the repeal of clause 11. The new clause refers to "any worker".

Mr. Clarke: I shall come to that point. The Government take the view that this provision, which is designed to stop labourers being paid in tokens, is perhaps not the most pressing cause at present. However, it is undesirable that a handful of people should be able to stop a change towards a more cash-free society. We propose repeal. But the Opposition think that in 1831 the provisions did not go far enough. They think that in today's social conditions any workers who are now paid in cash should be protected in law. They are moving in a direction that is a little out of touch when it comes to legal reform.

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Clarke: I shall give way to an hon. Gentleman who, I am quite convinced, is out of tune with the times on a wide number of social and political matters.

Mr. Nellist: Saying that the 1831 Act has no validity ought to stick in the craw of a Government who are supposed to be taking us back to Victorian values. The Minister accused us of talking about the Act as if it applied only to low-paid workers. Of course it applies to manual workers on £150 or £200 a week. But if they were given the choice, those workers might well go over to cashless pay, because they would not have to worry about keeping £100 in their bank accounts to avoid bank charges. They might even have cars, so they would not have to rely on the poor bus services in rural areas to reach a bank, building society or post office when it is open. The low-paid will be hurt most if they lose the right to be paid in cash, because they will, by definition, have the most problems if this Bill is enacted.

8.15 pm

Mr. Clarke: In defending part of the Truck Acts, the hon. Gentleman is not defending Victorian values, because we are talking about pre-Victorian legislation. The provisions that he so passionately defends were almost out of date before the great Queen died. It has taken us a long time to get round to repealing them. It has been frequently said that employers and employees do not want this change. But if nobody wants it, there will not be any change. Nothing in the Bill obliges an employer or employee to stop cash payments if that is what he prefers.

Opposition Members may have noticed that an increasing number of people have bank accounts. The banks are beginning to reverse their appallingly anti-consumer behaviour of a few years ago and are opening once more on Saturdays. There are also automatic paying-out services. More and more people have building society accounts. People are also paid in Giro, and we are moving towards a more cashless society.

We propose to repeal the legislation because the bulk of employees might be quite content to go over to non-cash payments—and good luck to them if they can negotiate some share of the savings—but it would need only a handful of people in the company to say that they are protected by the Truck Acts and that they will not agree to being paid in a different way, for that change to prove impossible. We have heard some amazing hyperbole and tales of agony and grief. If we repeal this provision, we shall move towards being a cashless society in line with other modern societies that we should consider to be our rough equivalent.

The proportion of payments made by cash in this country compared with the proportion made by cash in other countries is relevant. In Britain, 39 per cent. of wage payments are made in cash. In America 1 per cent. of wage payments are made in cash. In the Federal Republic of Germany 5 per cent. are paid in cash. The Truck Acts have stopped that drift towards a cashless society.

There are two advantages to making it much easier for the bulk of the population and their employers to move into the late 20th century and further towards a cashless society. First, it is much more efficient and less costly. Substantial savings can be made per employee. That is why various bodies such as local authorities as well as many private sector employers are anxious to move to cash-free payments. If substantial sums can be saved——

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): What about collective bargaining?

Mr. Clarke: Collective bargaining cannot waive legal rights. If neither the employer nor the employee is interested in non-cash payments, I assume that they will not be made. But if a trade union wanted to negotiate changing to non-cash payments and had the support of the employees—perhaps there is some deal that will share out the savings — it would need only a couple of employees to say, "Blow that. We shall insist on our legal rights under the Truck Acts," for that process to be brought to a halt, unless our Bill is enacted and the Truck Acts are repealed. Unions cannot negotiate away the legal rights of their members.

The hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) is defending archaic law. In this country there is a high proportion of wage payments in cash, which means that costs are imposed on industry. In many industries, both the employer and the employee are deprived of the chance to participate in the savings that can be made from going over to a cashless system of payment.

A cashless system of payment would also reduce the opportunities for crime. I spoke about that on Second Reading, so I shall not dilate about it again. In this country, wage snatches are a profitable form of criminal activity. Very large sums of cash are moved about in order to pay people under our old-fashioned system, and that means a high security risk. In 1984, there were almost 450 armed robberies at factories and offices or on the public highway. Many of them were wages snatches. It is a totally unnecessary credit risk to have security lorries stuffed full of banknotes going in and out of factories every week because we are such a traditional society that we have not got round to repealing the legislation.

Savings can be made, and there are obvious implications for crime prevention. The Bill would enable us to make social changes, in line with more modern societies, which most people would regard as perfectly predictable in today's age. I am told that people do not have bank accounts, that they cannot open them, or that they are costly. But the position is steadily changing. I am told that 75 per cent. of adults have bank accounts. Almost 90 per cent. have accounts at some deposit-taking institution.

There are more credit cards, and more people are accustomed to taking advantage of automated banking facilities.

Ms. Clare Short: What about stolen credit cards?

Mr. Clarke: When the hon. Lady replies, she will obviously launch into an attack on the whole concept of the banking society. She feels that credit cards and cheque books worry hon. Members. I can only assume that the hon. Members who have spoken in the debate and the hon. Lady, who is about to do so, keep their savings in an old sock at the bottom of their bed and pay their bills in pound coins. The fact is that three quarters of the adult population have a bank account. We are plainly moving towards a society in which less cash will be used and more convenient non-cash transactions will take place. There are small, vulnerable groups which for years have been accustomed to taking payments in forms other than cash.

I conclude on what I regard as a telling point. The Opposition's claims about the low-paid employed presumably do not apply to the unemployed. For years, the unemployed have not been paid the unemployment benefit by cash. They have been paid by Giro. All social security benefits are paid by Giro. I am astonished that the Opposition have not thrown in that all-embracing clause, that march back to the great days of William IV of 1831, and the equivalent legal protection for the unemployed and those who receive social security benefits. The Opposition have not thought through their proposal.

An extraordinary and impassioned debate has been aroused around a quite insignificant repeal provision. The Opposition's new clause would have the preposterous effect of extending a legal protection, which became outmoded a century or more ago, to many people to whom it does not apply at the moment.

Ms. Clare Short: The Paymaster General and Minister for Employment insulted low-paid workers by pretending that the Bill which will damage them so severely is about giving them cards. That was not funny. We are talking about workers who run out of money at the end of every week. Each week, they must decide whether to spend their money on food for their children or on clothes that they might need. Too many people live like that. The Minister insulted the unemployed when he talked as though they do not have plenty of time to go to a post office or a bank to get their money. That is just whey they do have—too little to do, and too little money. To say that we are holding back the low paid from the conditions enjoyed by the unemployed is a joke and insensitive.

Neither the Labour party nor the British people are opposed to cashless pay. In fact, in the recent past, there has been a massive shift towards cashless pay by negotiation, agreement and freedom of choice. In 1969, 75 per cent. of all employees were paid in cash. Now, the figure is below 40 per cent.

We are in favour of massive progress by agreement, consent and free choice. Our new clause and amendment say that those who are currently paid in cash shall continue to be paid in cash unless they give their consent to a change. We advocate freedom of choice to people, and not legislation that forces them into something that they do not want.

The repeal of the Truck Acts is not required to introduce cashless pay. The Central Policy Review Staff, the old think tank, said in its study that it was not a major barrier. The movement has been going on, in any event. The repeal of the Truck Acts means that people can be forced into such a position in an inconvenient way, without sharing the benefits of the savings to employers. Until now, employers who have moved in that respect have had to negotiate. They have known of the benefits to themselves from such a change. They have told workers, "We shall give you part of the benefit. We are moving to monthly pay. We shall help you in the process of change." None of that will be necessary now. It can, and indeed will, be forced on workers whether they like it or not.

My hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) has already received a complaint from shop workers who have been told that, with the legislation, they will be moved on to cashless and monthly pay. Those shop workers are women on low pay. They are worried because, after finishing work, they spend their money on shopping for their families.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I intervene because the hon. Lady is being carried away, again, into error. The legislation and the Opposition's new clause have nothing to do with changes to monthly pay. As to a change being made without agreement, if it is a term of the contract of employment, nothing in the legislation enables an employer to overturn, unilaterally, the contract of employment. The example cited by the hon. Lady was miles wide of the mark with respect to the effect of the Bill or the new clause.

Ms. Short: The Minister is wrong. In practice, in the real world, the shifts to cashless and monthly pay go together.

Mr. Martin rose——

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn) rose——

Mr. Kenneth Clarke rose——

Ms. Short: I shall give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Straw rose——

Mr. Clarke: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms. Short: No, I gave way to the right hon. and learned Gentleman just now.

Mr. Straw: The Minister said that my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) was in error. I corroborate everything she said about what is happening in Blackburn. The information came from me. I am certain about it. Whatever the Minister says about a particular national firm—I shall not name it because the employees fear for their jobs—[Interruption.] Oh, yes. The Minister knows about unemployment in Blackburn. The company is moving towards cashless pay only because of the legislation and the fear that it can generate in the minds of workers.

Ms. Short: My hon. Friend reinforces the point——

Mr. Kenneth Clarke rose——

Ms. Short: I shall not give way. We are under pressure. The Minister spoke for some time.

It is inconvenient for some workers to be paid in a non-cash form. Women who earn a small amount, who perhaps work part-time, like to get their money and go out shopping. They find it inconvenient to receive cashless pay because they must go to a bank to withdraw the money.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke rose——

Ms. Short: I shall give way before I am finished, but not yet. I understand that the Truck Acts extend to shop workers. I understand that the Under-Secretary of State has looked up the legislation. The Minister and I shall have to look it up in detail. There is a general understanding that shop workers are covered by the protection of the legislation.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The hon. Lady is wrong.

Ms. Short: I am not wrong. I do not know why the Paymaster General seeks to heckle. I think that it is because his case is so bad. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. The Minister should set an example to hon. Members. He is not the only one who heckles from a sedentary position, but he is the last person who should do so.

Ms. Short: The Opposition do not care about what is happening in the United States of America in the way that Government Members passionately do. We care about what is in the interests of workers in Britain. We want those workers to have freedom of choice. We want those workers who are currently paid in cash to continue to be paid in cash or to negotiate agreements that suit themselves.

Mr. Martin rose——

Ms. Short: I must finish or my Whip will strangle me.

The Opposition are in favour of freedom of choice. The Government are taking from low-paid workers the right to be paid in cash if that suits their convenience.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The hon. Lady said that she would give way to me before she resumed her seat. I am not talking about the facts of the Blackburn case. I point out to her that the law to which she referred applies to manual workers' rights to be paid in cash. She is not talking about the real world. She is talking about the 1831 law. The debate has nothing to do with weekly or monthly payments and part-time women workers, because hardly any of them are manual workers. It has nothing to do with the low-paid, because it protects some low-paid workers and not others. Does the hon. Lady concede that she has actually got the legislation to which she referred fairly thoroughly around her neck?

Ms. Short: The Minister protests too much and knows too little. There are many female part-time manual workers in my constituency. They live in poverty. They need their money in cash. That is their preference. The Opposition believe in their freedom of choice. The Paymaster General does not.

Clause 1

GENERAL RESTRICTIONS ON DEDUCTIONS MADE, OR PAYMENTS RECEIVED, BY EMPLOYERS

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 9, leave out 'of his' and insert 'employed by him'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient also to consider Government amendments Nos. 6, 48, 49, and 51.

Mr. Trippier: These amendments change the phrase "worker of his" to "worker employed by him" wherever it occurs in the Bill, and make changes consequent on such rewording. They reflect concern which was expressed by the opposition in Committee about the infelicitous, although unintended, inference which could be drawn from the original wording.

The point—eloquently put at the second sitting of the Committee by the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo)—is that "worker of his" could be taken to imply ownership, reducing the worker to the same status, I recall him saying, as a machine tool or workbench, something that is the property of the employer. "Worker employed by him" avoids any such implications of ownership.

Ms. Clare Short: My hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo), who moved the original amendment in Committee, cannot be here now. I am sure that he would be pleased at his symbolic victory. It is a pity we could not win more real changes in the Bill. None the less, for the Government to bring forward in 1986 a Bill which talks about workers belonging to their employers shows something about their attitude. My hon. Friend's efforts have amended the Bill in a desirable direction.

Amendment agreed to

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 1, line 12, leave out 'term' and insert 'provision'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient also to consider the following: Government amendments Nos. 7 and 8.

Amendment No. 9, in page 2, line 7, leave out 'shown' and insert 'given'.

Government amendments Nos. 10, 11, 12 and 17.

Mr. Trippier: This is my attempt to be fair and reasonable, despite the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) has just said. These amendments have been tabled in response to an undertaking that I gave, which I think is referred to in column 65 of the report of second sitting of the Committee.

On that occasion I undertook to consider a proposal put forward by the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar that the written term which sets out the circumstances in which a deduction from wages may be made should be given rather than shown to the worker.

I think that Opposition Members will agree that these amendments achieve this intention. Their effect is that, where the employer relies on a written term of the contract to authorise a deduction he must, in advance of the deduction, give the worker a copy of the term authorising the deduction or give him an explanation of the term. Indeed, the amendments go further by providing that, where the employer has to rely on two or more terms, a copy of each of these terms must be given to the worker or the combined effect of such terms must be explained to the worker.

These amendments improve the Bill and give added protection to the worker against unlawful deductions from wages. I commend the amendments to the House.

8.45 pm

Mr. Nellist: I remember taking part in that debate in Committee. I ask the Minister the same question now as I asked then. He has made a halfway house attempt with this set of amendments. Why, given the Government's view that a contract of employment is a quasi-legal document which is solemn and binding, is he not prepared to introduce Government amendments which say that the question of deductions and so on should be in a document signed by the worker and the employer to show that both agree to its provisions?

Mr. Trippier: When we are talking about a contract of employment, as we discussed in Committee at some length, it does not have to be a written contract. With this legislation we have insisted that at least there should be a written term of a contract which makes it clear that there is a power to deduct. A written term has to be handed to the worker and there must be proof that that has taken place. I think that the hon. Gentleman should be satisfied. Amendment No. 9, tabled in the name of the Opposition, will have a similar effect to the amendment I am moving. I hope that, under the circumstances, the Opposition will feel it necessary to withdraw that amendment.

Ms. Clare Short: This again is a small but welcome amendment. Under the Bill as drafted it would have been possible for an employer to make a deduction simply having waved a piece of paper under the nose of a worker and only showing the written terms of the contract to the worker and not having to give a copy to the worker. That is rectified by the amendment. The amendment is a concession—only a small one but it is something—that the Government have been forced by the Opposition to make. We are grateful for that and, of course, we shall withdraw amendment No. 9.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That does not arise on the question before the House. We shall deal with that, if necessary, when we come to it.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Caborn: I beg to move amendment No. 5, in page 1, line 15, at end insert—

'(c) the employer makes the deduction within 12 months of the discovery of the act or omission complained of'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient also to consider Government amendments Nos. 26, 27, 29, 31, 32, 33, 38, 39, 41 and 42.

Mr. Caborn: In Committee we argued forcefully about the position of an employer being effectively handed an open cheque in being able to make deductions from a worker going back any length of time that the employer could find to be justified. We thought that that was wrong and, to a large extent, against the natural trend of British justice. Timetables are laid down, and we thought that that was extremely important for the Bill. We did not believe that it was right that an employer could tell an employee that he had committed an act of theft or whatever five years previously and that that was now to be brought against him.

It is evident that the force of argument put by my hon. Friends in Committee has sunk in with the Government because in amendment No. 26, the Government, to a large extent, accept our points. However, their amendment is to a different part of the Bill—clause 2. That is welcome. My hon. Friends' arguments were put forcefully and in a common-sense way. They were born out of their knowledge of industry. The Paymaster General's performance showed that he does not even know who is covered by the Truck Acts. That shows a certain amount of misunderstanding at best and total illiteracy at worst.

Therefore——

Mr. Kenneth Clarke rose——

Mr. Caborn: The right hon. and learned Gentleman will have plenty of time to have a go.

Therefore, I hope that the Government will concur with what I have been saying about our amendment. Their amendment No. 26 shows that they agree with its purpose.

Mr. Trippier: I was waiting to hear the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) say that he was prepared to withdraw his amendment, because I am about to try to convince the House that the amendments tabled in the Government's name meet his point.

This group of amendments comprise 10 Government amendments and one Opposition amendment. They are all concerned with the same point. We have tabled our amendments because of the commitment that I gave in Committee that we would consider whether an amendment was required to ensure that deductions related to cash shortages or stock deficiencies would be entirely prohibited if there was unreasonable delay between the date the cash shortage or stock deficiency occurred and the date the employer made a deduction from wages in respect of that shortage or deficiency. Having considered the matter in a fair and reasonable light, I believe that something specific is required in the Bill, and I am happy to support the amendments, which I am sure will meet the concern expressed by Opposition Members.

The amendments will mean that, in order to make a lawful deduction on account of a cash shortage or stock deficiency, an employer will have to make the deduction no later than 12 months after either the date on which he established the existence of the shortage or deficiency in respect of which the deduction is made or, if earlier, the date when he ought reasonably to have established its existence. In layman's terms, that means that a deduction will be lawful if the employer makes the deduction within 12 months of finding out about a shortage unless he could reasonably be expected to find out about it earlier, in which case the deduction would be lawful only if he made it within 12 months of the date on which he ought to have found out about the existence of the shortage.

That will prevent employers—I am sure that they are few in number—who decide to victimise a worker, for whatever reason, dredging up a lot of old events on which they took no action at the time and eventually starting to make deductions in the distant future. That was the point that I accepted in Committee. I thought that that was immoral. In addition, the provision will help to prevent disputes over events that happened so far back in the past that memories have become blurred about what actually took place, and to avoid resultant injustices — for example, the wrong worker suffering a deduction or shortage.

I think that hon. Members on both sides of the House will agree that the amendments are an improvement to the Bill. I commend them to the House and ask the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central to withdraw his amendment because ours meets his point.

Ms. Clare Short: This is another series of concessions achieved by the Opposition, and they are of some significance. Under the Bill as drafted, an employer was given the power to go back as long as he wished—10 or 20 years — to find any shortage or damage and act against the worker by making deductions or fines. We said that two people might work together in a friendly way but then fall out, and it might lead to the employer seeking to victimise the worker, going back over many years, claiming that there had been stock shortages and then claiming massive deductions from the worker.

The imbalance in the Government's perspective was clear in the unamended Bill, in that the employer was given the right to go back timelessly, but any employee who intended to go to a tribunal to complain that he had had an illegal deduction had to act within three months or lose his legal right. In this group of amendments, the Government have conceded both points. The employer is limited in that he can go back only 11 months and the workers can take their case to a tribunal within a period that a tribunal judges reasonable. I think that that is a correct understanding of the Government's amendments. Therefore, the three-month time limit is gone.

The Bill is still highly unacceptable, but at least the Opposition have gained improved protection for workers, little as it might be. I imagine that in the circumstances, my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) will be willing to withdraw our amendment, although it is notable that the Opposition amendment takes up only two lines but the Government found it necessary to have 10 lines to achieve the same objective.

Mr. Caborn: I thought that the Government might accept our amendment, based on what my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) has said — that ours is much shorter and will take up less space and paper. Obviously, that is not so. When one sees a ray of common sense from the Government, one has to grasp it with both hands. On that basis, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendments made: No. 6, in page 2, line 2 leave out 'of his' and insert 'employed by him'.

No. 7, in page 2, line 4 leave out 'term' and insert 'provision'.

No. 8 in page 2, line 5 leave out from 'contact', to 'on' in line 7 and insert

'means any provision of the contract comprised—

(a) in one or more written terms of the contract of which the employer has given the worker a copy".

No. 10, in page 2, line 12 leave out

'any other express or implied term of the contract'

and insert

'in one or more terms of the contract (whether express or implied and, if express, whether oral or in writing)'.

No. 11, in page 2, line 13 after 'effect', insert

', or (as the case may be) combined effect,'.

No. 12, in page 2, line 17 leave out 'term' and insert 'provision'.—[Mr. Trippier.]

Ms. Clare Short: I beg to move Amendment No. 13, in page 2, line 17 leave out from 'contract' to 'or' in line 18.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 14, in page 2, line 23, leave out 'the variation took effect or (as the case may be)'.

Ms. Short: The purpose of the amendment is to check that the Bill means what the Minister claimed in Committee. We were concerned that under the Bill it would be impossible for an employer to produce a version of the contract—we have to be clear that an implied term of a contract can justify a fine or deduction—wave it in front of an employee's nose and then say that he was therefore making a deduction that was allowed under the contract. The Minister assured us that that was not possible. He told us that under the Bill it was absolutely necessary that the terms of the contract were clear and shown to the worker before the act or omission complained of led to the deduction or fine. Indeed, the Minister spoke in quite strong language. He said that it would be immoral if it were otherwise. I am sure that what he said was sincere and that that was his honest reading of the Bill.

I do not claim to be right on this matter, although we think we are right on shop assistants. It is notable that the Paymaster General got that wrong as well as so many things in the Bill, but I am sure we shall come back to that.

Let us look at clause 1(4). The protection that the Minister relied on in his arguments in Committee seems to apply only to a variation in the term of a contract, not to the provisions of the original contract. The amendment will change subsection (4) to read:

"For the purposes of this section—

(a) Any relevant term of a worker's contract or

(b) any agreement or consent signified by a worker as mentioned in subsection (1)(b), shall not operate to authorise the making of any deduction, or the receipt of any payment, on account of any conduct of the worker, or any event occurring, before the agreement or consent was signified."

I hope that the Minister will respond fully to this point.

The Bill as drafted does not guarantee the position that the Minister said would be the correct one. The amendments are necessary to bring the Bill into line with the undertakings that he gave. That is the purpose of the amendments and we will be interested to hear the Minister's response.

Mr. Trippier: It might be helpful to the House if I tried to explain, in speaking to these amendments, exactly what subsection (4) of clause 1 achieves. The previous subsections established that a deduction from pay may be lawful if it is provided for in the contract of employment, with any provision that provides for a deduction being given or explained in writing to the worker to ensure compliance with subsection (3) before a deduction authorised by such provision is made.

We start from the position that both sides, employers and workers, know the rules about deductions and observe them. Subsection (4) means that, if a contract is changed so that an employer can thereafter make deductions if certain behaviour occurs, the employer is prevented from making deductions in respect of conduct that occurred before the change.

We cannot provide that no change in a contract can ever be made. If we did that, contracts would be set in stone for all time. We can start, and we intend to start—this is the assurance that I gave the Committee—making changes retrospectively authorising deductions, and subsection (4) achieves that. I believe that that is sufficient protection.

Ms. Clare Short: I am carefully following the Minister's comments. However, my reading of paragraphs (a) and (b) of subsection (3) leads me to believe that it would require the employer to show the written terms of the contract or any other express terms of the contract to the worker at any time before making a deduction. The Bill appears to state that. However, in Committee the Minister said that he considered that that would be immoral and that the terms of the contract must have been shown to the worker before the act or omission that led to the deduction. Perhaps the drafting could have been improved. That is the point I am trying to secure and I hope that the Minister can understand that. Paragraphs (a) and (b), as drafted, do not secure that position.

Mr. Trippier: I can only repeat to the hon. Lady the assurance that I gave her in Committee. I have expressed my understanding of the matter and that is the legal interpretation of the Bill on the advice given to me by my Department's solicitors.

The Committee agreed with me that it was objectionable and wrong that an employer should spring a deduction on an employee at a moment's notice. For example, it would be unacceptable for an employer to decide on a Thursday evening—if wages were normally paid on a Friday — to hand a written term to the employee for an event that occurred weeks or even months before. I can assure the hon. Lady and the House that as subsection (4) is currently drafted, there is no way that we would allow retrospective authorised deductions. I believe that that will be sufficient protection.

The amendments appear to be designed to stop employers changing the contract. There is a difference of opinion between the Government and the Opposition on this point. Under the amendments, a deduction arising from a changed term would mean that a change could be made in the term without the written consent of the worker. That is not necessary, as a contract cannot be changed without the worker giving consent, even if that consent is only implied in the fact that the worker does not repudiate it. There is no extra protection in the amendments and no reason to put extra hurdles in the way of the parties if they agree to change the contract.

Ms. Clare Short: I have no alternative but to accept the Minister's assurances. However, I am baffled by the drafting of the Bill in that subsection (3)(a) provides:

"a written term of the contract which the employer has shown to the worker shall be on any occasion prior to the employer making the deduction in question"—

Mr. Trippier rose——

Ms. Clare Short: I should like to finish my point.

Subsection (4), which authorises a variation in the contract, states that such a variation

"shall not operate to authorise the making of any deduction, or the receipt of any payment, on account of any conduct of the worker, or any other event occurring, before the variation took effect".

It would seem that there is more protection in the case of a variation than in the other case. Therefore, the purpose of the amendment was to apply the protection that applies in the case of a variation to all contracts, not to make it impossible to make a variation. I do not think that we will settle this point tonight. I assume that the Minister and his advisers are correct, although I am not confident of that.

Mr. Trippier: I would like to reassure the hon. Lady. I am truly not being unfair to her. I have been down this track before. She raised the matter with me, quite rightly, on 25 February. I decided to consider it and said that I needed notice to study it in some detail. In Committee on 27 February my first words were:

"On a point of order, Sir Anthony. The Committee will recall that, on Tuesday, I gave an undertaking to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) to confirm that my interpretation of clause 1(4) was correct. I am happy to assure the Committee, and especially the hon. Lady, that subsection 1(4) ensures that an employer cannot, by any means, introduce a term allowing a deduction to be made for conduct after the incident has occurred."—[Official Report, Standing Committee K, 27 February 1986; c. 113.]

Ms. Short: Given the Minister's assurance, which I hope proves to be right in practice when interpreted by the courts, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I beg to move amendment No. 15, in page 2, line 26, leave out subsection (5).

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 50.

Mr. Clarke: The amendment gives me the opportunity to return to a small matter which is causing a little agitated debate between myself and the hon. Members for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) and for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn)—whether the main Truck Acts include shop workers in the definition of manual labourers.

I accept that a number of political issues could come between myself and the hon. Lady, and I am sure that she will agree that there are probably more substantial matters that we could argue about than the Truck Act of 1831 as applied by the Truck (Amendment) Act 1887.

But I understand now why there have been these vigorous exchanges between myself and Labour Members. They are relying, in exactly the same way as I would rely if I were in opposition, and as I used to rely, on a letter from the economic affairs section of the Library. I would normally have relied on that briefing and, as I know its author well, I would particularly have relied on her opinion. But those who advise me have shown me the references and I have looked them up for myself and I believe that on this rare occasion the advice from the Library is wrong.

The definition of manual worker in the main Truck Acts of 1831 was made clearer by the Truck (Amendment) Act 1887. That is explained in pages 1700 onwards of the second edition of Redgrave's "Health and Safety in Factories". There are a fascinating series of decisions about this legislation. The one relevant to shop assistants is Bound v. Lawrence, 1892, 1 Queen's Bench, 226. If anybody wants to know, bus conductors, bus drivers, railway guards and others are not protected by the Truck Acts, and shop workers and assistants could not rely upon the Acts that we are talking about.

On the other hand, when one moves to deductions, one finds that the Truck Act 1896 extends the protection on deductions and fines to shop workers as well as workmen. It was that change which led to the phrase in the letter from the Library and is relevant to these technical amendments which are designed to clarify the definition of the word "deduction" for the purpose of the Bill. I hope that they will be acceptable to the House, including the Opposition, because the principal purpose of deleting clause 1(5) and replacing it with the new subsections is to try to close a possible loophole that a less than scrupulous employer might try to use to evade the protection that we are giving in the Bill to those in the retail trade in relation to deductions.

Let me give brief illustrations of the problem and what we are doing by giving three examples of what might amount to a deduction from pay. First, an employer could disagree with a worker about how much pay is due to the worker. If the employer pays what in his opinion is due, and he has a genuine disagreement with his employee, who thinks that he is entitled to more, that is not a deduction for the purpose of the Bill. That is a dispute about the contractual entitlement to pay and that will be decided by the ordinary courts, not by the industrial tribunal. That is true under any definition in the Bill.

In the second case, the employer might pay the worker concerned less than his ordinary entitlement by taking out of the pay that he hands over some sort of fine or deduction, perhaps for disciplinary reasons or to cover a deficiency. That plainly is a deduction. We covered that in our first attempt to define a deduction and that is principally what this part of the Bill is about.

Thirdly, an employer may deliberately pay a worker less than he owes him and may do so merely for some general reason, perhaps because he simply does not wish to comply with his full contractual obligations.

As the Bill was originally drafted, there might have been room for doubt about whether that deliberate failure to pay amounted to a deduction. The amendments, which would put two new subsections into clause 8, provide that, when the employer pays a worker less than is properly payable, that will be a deduction, unless the reason is an error of computation concerning the amount of wages due.

I hope that I have been reasonably clear about two technical amendments which will clarify the meaning of "deduction" and close a potentially serious loophole through which some employers might have escaped.

Ms. Clare Short: There has been some interesting confusion about whether shop workers are covered by the Truck Acts. The Paymaster General was right when he suggested that we had relied on the briefing from the Library. Such briefings are normally second to none and I am not yet convinced that the Library is wrong in this case. We shall look into the matter, but I accept that it is possible that the Library is wrong and that is why we were misled.

However, it seems that the national multiple chain in Blackburn was misled in the same way as our Library, because it told its workers that they will have cashless pay imposed on them. It seems that that major company is under the same illusion—if it be an illusion—as the Library.

The Government's reasons for the amendment are not objectionable to the Opposition. Indeed, if the Paymaster General answers a question in the affirmative, we shall warmly welcome amendment No. 50. The amendment provides:

"Where the total amount of any wages that are paid on any occasion by an employer to any worker employed by him is less than the total amount of the wages that are properly payable by him to the worker" and the underpayment is not due to an error of computation, it will count as a deduction.

If an employer is paying illegal wages under part II of the Bill, will he be caught? Does the amendment mean that workers who are illegally underpaid will acquire the right to go to a tribunal and to take action immediately, without having to go through the wages inspectorate which never prosecutes? It seems to me that that might be the meaning of the amendment.

What are the wages that are "properly payable" to the worker? Are they the wages that are normally paid or are they the wages that are legally required? If an employer is making illegal underpayments, surely they are not wages that are "properly payable".

The amendment says that a deficiency shall be treated as a deduction

"for the purpose of this Part",

but I cannot see that that excludes my interpretation.

I am enormously interested in amendment No. 50. It could be an enormous change of heart by the Government, although I think that it is probably an accident. The Government may have stumbled into giving workers who have received illegal underpayments a remedy that would be easier than that currently available to them, given that there are too few wages inspectors and that the wages inspectorate is obsessed with being friendly with employers, does not collect adequate information on the needs of workers and has an absolute policy of not prosecuting on first offences. Perhaps my interpretation of the amendment is fanciful, but it seems to me to be a possible interpretation.

Mr. Martin: May I ask the Minister a few questions about a matter concerning which I have already asked various questions? I do not expect him to recall them because his hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Employment, the hon. Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale (Mr. Lang) answered them. It relates to an organisation that runs a Manpower Services Commission project, for which I understand the Paymaster General is ultimately responsible. A complaint about delay was made about that organisation. It was not the first time that such a complaint had been brought to my attention. It was that the sponsors of the project, who were therefore acting on behalf of the Government, had delayed paying the bus fares of those who were on MSC projects.

In view of what the Minister has said, would this deliberate delay in the payment of fares be regarded as a deduction from wages? If so, would employees be entitled to take the matter to an industrial tribunal? It would be helpful to have an answer to that question.

Wages councils cover only certain people in certain services. The catering industry is one such service; hairdressing is another. The Paymaster General knows that, on certain MSC projects, meals are provided for the elderly. That is perfectly satisfactory, but all the employees involved in those projects are doing a job identical to the job performed by those in the catering industry. They are working in kitchens. They are serving, preparing and delivering food. If necessary, do those employees have recourse to the wages councils and to the wages inspectorate?

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The previous disagreement between us was because both of us were relying upon what is usually completely reliable advice, but on that occasion it came to differing conclusions. On this occasion I am flying somewhat more blind. If I sail perfectly into error on this occasion, I shall write to the hon. Lady and correct what I am about to say.

The hon. Lady asked a very interesting question about what would happen to those employees who are covered by the wages councils as far as this definition of "deduction" is concerned. I understand that, when a deliberate deduction is made by the employer, it will be regarded as a deduction and will be subject to the provisions of the Bill. The dispute can be solved by an industrial tribunal. If, however, an employer makes a computation error — if, in other words, he makes a mistake—the matter will go to the courts. If there is a disagreement between the parties about what wages are properly due, that also will go to the courts. If, as I say, there is a deliberate deduction from what the employer knows to be due, it will be covered by the Bill and the matter will go before an industrial tribunal.

To relate that to the wages council provisions, if an employer is paying less than a wages council's required rate and if he knows that he is paying less than that which is properly due, which means that he is intentionally paying less than the wages council's rate, my understanding is that the hon. Lady is right and that the protections that are afforded under this part of the Bill will apply. If, however, the employer does not realise that a higher rate is properly due and he makes a computation error, that will not count as a deduction under the Bill and the matter will have to be resolved by the courts if the wages inspectorate is unable to sort it out in the ordinary way.

Ms. Short: I am grateful to the Paymaster General. I agree with his interpretation of the wording of this amendment. May I ask him for an undertaking: that if we are both right he will not amend the Bill; he will leave it as it is, so that workers who are illegally underpaid will have the right to go to an industrial tribunal on the grounds that they have suffered an illegal deduction?

Mr. Clarke: I am content to give that undertaking. When an employer deliberately makes a deduction below that which he knows to be lawfully due, that will be covered by this part of the Bill.

I know that the Bill is more limited in terms of protection than the Opposition would like, but everything that we have said about deductions will apply if an employer deliberately pays less than that which he knows legally to be the entitlement of the employee. An error or disagreement about the rate would be resolved in the courts.

To settle the bus fares issue, we must turn to the definition of wages in clause 7. I shall write to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) about the second part of his question, which I did not follow because I was considering the first part and listening with only one ear. The repayment of bus fares and other expenses is not covered by the definition of wages in clause 7, so a failure to pay extra expenses is not relevant. Clause 7(2)(a) expressly excludes from the definition of wages any payment in respect of expenses incurred by the employee.

Mr. Nellist: I understand that the Minister thinks that it is wrong for an employer wilfully to allow somebody to be paid less than that to which they are legally entitled, and that there should be some redress.

After I argued with the junior Minister in Committee I received a letter saying that anyone in receipt of family income supplement whose wages fell below the family income supplement baseline because of a deduction, would not have the right to claim anything extra from the DHSS because the assessment of FIS is based on the notional gross wage before deduction. Is there not a parallel between that and the concession that has just been made to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short), in that the DHSS would willingly allow someone to fall below the official Government-defined poverty line by disregarding regular deductions?

Mr. Clarke: That was a good try. I do not accept the analogy. We are talking about a deduction by the employer. If the employer knows what his employee is legally entitled to, and pays less than that deliberately, he is making a deduction and must be prepared to comply with the Bill's provisions; otherwise, the employee has a remedy.

The way in which family income supplement is assessed and the definition of income for the purpose of making the annual assessment of FIS entitlement is a matter for DHSS regulations. The hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) will have to raise the matter with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services if he wants to argue that the rules for FIS should be changed.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move amendment No. 16, in page 2, line 40 at end insert—

'(aa) to any deduction from a worker's wages made by his employer, or any payment received from a worker by his employer, where the purpose of deduction or payment is the reimbursement of the employer in respect of any overpayment of wages made (for any reason) by the employer to the worker;'.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 18.

Mr. Trippier: Under this amendment the provisions of part I will not apply to deductions made by an employer or payments received by him to recover earlier overpayment of wages. Deductions to recover overpayments of wages should not, in the Government's view, be caught by the Bill and employers should not be hampered in recovering such payments.

Since the Bill was published, representations have been made to the Government that it would lead to difficulties in payroll administration if it was not made clear that deductions from wages made merely to recover earlier overpayments of wages were not covered by the Bill.

It is the practice of some firms to make small overpayments of wages, for reasons of administrative convenience, that are later recovered. An example is where information on bonus or overtime payments are not available in the pay office until after the wages have to be paid—or the computer run—so a standard sum is paid with a small adjustment, up or down, the following week. Without this amendment, such downward adjustments would be deductions for the purposes of the Bill and thus unlawful unless explicitly provided for in the contract.

The effect would be to require contracts of employment to be rewritten to ensure that the employer does not fall foul of the Bill if he ever makes adjustments to recover anything overpaid, accidentally or for reasons of administrative convenience, in an earlier payment of wages. We do not want to cause such an upheaval in personnel practices and consequently propose to disapply the Bill to deductions to recover earlier overpayments.

There is no possibility of injustice arising from that. If a deduction is to recover an overpayment, the worker has received what is due to him. If the worker disputes that the deduction is for that purpose, he can, of course, complain to an industrial tribunal that will have to form a view on the matter.

Amendment No. 18 is required to avoid a situation where the Bill would make the enforcement of court or tribunal orders ineffective. Without the amendment, an employer who had obtained a court or tribunal order against a worker requiring the worker to pay an amount to the employer would be in breach of clause 1 of the Bill when he received a payment from the worker under the order. That would happen because, when the employer received the payment, it would not have been authorised by statute, by the contract, or with the prior written agreement of the worker. So the requirements of clause 1(2) of the Bill would not be met. It would obviously be a legal nonsense if an employer who obtained a court order against a worker found that he could not obtain the amount from the worker without being in breach of the Bill.

The amendment will resolve that by removing deductions and payments in such circumstances from the scope of clause 1. Payments may be received from the worker by the employer to meet the amount specified in the court or tribunal order without complying with clause 1(2). Alternatively, deductions from wages to meet the amount specified may be made without complying with clause 1(1), provided that the worker has given his prior agreement or consent in writing. The latter is a reasonable safeguard for the worker because it ensures that deductions to satisfy the order will be lawful only if he has agreed that the sum that he has been ordered to pay can be recovered by deduction from his wages. Furthermore, it is likely that if the employer decides to recover the amount by deductions, he will agree to do so in instalments, which is an obvious benefit to the worker.

Where the employer fails to obtain the prior written agreement of the worker, the provisions of clause 1 will apply and the deductions from wages will be in breach of the Bill. A worker would then have the right to complain to an industrial tribunal that an unlawful deduction had been made.

This amendment is essential to resolve an unintended consequence of the Bill and I ask the House to accept it.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 17, in page 3, line 11, leave out 'term' and insert 'provision'.

No. 18, in page 3, line 27, at end insert—

'(e) to any deduction from a worker's wages made by his employer with his prior agreement or consent signified in writing, or any payment received from a worker by his employer, where the purpose of the deduction or payment is the satisfaction (whether wholly or in part) of an order of a court or tribunal requiring the payment of any amount by the worker to the employer.'.—[Mr. Trippier.]

Clause 2

DEDUCTIONS FROM WAGES OF WORKERS IN RETAIL EMPLOYMENT ON ACCOUNT OF CASH SHORTAGES ETC.

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move amendment No. 21, in page 3, leave out lines 43 and 44 and insert—

'"pay day", in relation to a worker, means a day on which wages are payable to the worker;'.

Mr. Speaker: With this we shall take Government amendment No. 34.

Mr. Trippier: These two amendments are concerned with definitions—the definitions of "pay day" and of "demand for payment" in clauses 2 and 3. The two expressions are unclear without the amendments. The amendments are for clarification and do not change policy.

Clauses 2 and 3 introduce controls on deductions and payments on account of cash shortages or stock deficiencies, which are limited to 10 per cent. of any wages payable to a worker on a pay day. The question is whether the pay day should be the day on which wages are payable—that is, due to be paid—or the day on which they are actually paid.

Amendment No. 21 changes the definition of pay day in clauses 2 and 3 from "any day on which any wages are paid to a worker" to

"a day on which wages are payable to the worker".

The amendment is required because the day on which wages are paid is not always a precise concept. When wages are paid by direct debit to a bank account, it is not clear whether the day on which wages are paid is to be regarded as the day on which the employer authorises payment or the day on which it is credited to the worker's bank account, which will be later. The amendment does not, however, alter the way in which the controls on deductions related to cash shortages and stock deficiencies operate.

9.30 pm

Amendment No. 34 clarifies what the phrase "demand for payment" means in clause 3 and how and when a demand is to be made. Clause 3, inter alia, requires that an employer may not lawfully receive a payment on account of a cash shortage or stock deficiency unless he makes a demand for payment in writing on a pay day.

The amendment provides that a demand for payment is made if it is given to the worker, posted to the worker's last known address or left at his last known address either on the pay day or, if the pay day is not a working day —if it is a Bank Holiday—on the first working day of the employer's business following that pay day. The amendment is needed so that employers and workers can clearly understand how and when a demand for payment must be made.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move amendment No. 22, in page 3, line 46, after 'worker', insert

'(whether on a regular basis or not)'.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 23, in page 4, line 1, leave out 'directly with members of the public'.

Government amendments Nos. 24 and 25.

Mr. Trippier: The amendments fulfil an undertaking that I gave in Committee to consider further the need to ensure that te protections given by clauses 2 and 3, which ensure that deductions from wages or payments made by the worker to the employer that are related to cash shortages or stock deficiencies are limited to 10 per cent. of gross wages, apply to all workers who need such protection. As drafted, the Bill covers those workers who are engaged in retail transactions directly with members of the public. I think that it was the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) who said that those working in hospital or factory canteens might not be so covered as they sell goods to fellow workers rather than to members of the public.

The amendment ensures that the protection applies to all workers who are engaged in the sale or supply of goods to members of the public, fellow workers or other individuals in their personal capacities. The amendment ensures also that a person who sells both to companies and to the public is fully covered in respect of all his sales.

I hope that hon. Members will support the amendment and those grouped with it, which provide a useful clarification of the Bill and extend the protection that it offers. Amendment No. 23 was tabled by the Opposition and it was designed to achieve the same effect as amendment No. 24. In the light of the Government's amendment, I hope that the Opposition will withdraw amendment No. 23.

Ms. Clare Short: This is another small concession, but one of some consequence to some workers, which has been won by the Opposition. The House will be aware that it is the Opposition's view that the limitation of fines or deductions to 10 per cent. of gross wages should apply to all workers for all disciplinary purposes. We advanced that argument strongly when discussing the first group of amendments. I am certain that we won the arguments, but unfortunately we do not have enough votes in this place to amend the Bill, although the time seems to be rapidly approaching when we shall have them.

The amendment is of significance to all workers who handle stock or cash but do not deal directly with members of the public. An obvious example is those who work in staff canteens. There are many who work in that capacity who do not deal with the public but handle a great deal of food, stock and cash. If the amendment were not made, they would be liable to deductions or fines up to 100 per cent. rather than to the 10 per cent. limit which the Government, for some strange reason, have decided to provide as a protection for retail workers only.

The Minister has explained that the protection has been given to retail workers because it is in the retail sector that there is the most worry about cash shortage and stock deficiencies. He appears to be telling us that this is the sector in which employers—that is the group to which the Government talk—think that a lot of fiddling is going on and in which deductions should be made. It seems to turn logic on its head to say that because employers are so concerned, the deductions that they make should be limited. We are grateful for small mercies and glad that the protection for workers in retailing extends to workers in canteens who deal with cash and stock, but with fellow workers rather than members of the public.

Mr. Nellist: Perhaps my hon. Friend could refresh my memory about the other half of the reason that the Minister gave. Was not his justification for not accepting our amendment to extend the 10 per cent. limit to all workers that, unless employers could fine employees, they would not be willing to take more workers on, which would lead to increased unemployment? Is not confining the limit to retailing effectively saying that the Minister expects more jobs to be lost in retailing?

Ms. Short: My hon. Friend is right. The Minister used that argument. My hon. Friend has quite fairly extended the logic and exposed the ridiculousness of the Government's case for not extending the 10 per cent. limit.

The amendment will protect some workers. It will protect canteen workers and probably others whom we have not thought of. We are glad of that, but wish that we could have achieved the same for more workers. As the Government have conceded the point, I shall not press the amendment.

Mr. Martin: Is there any way in which the Minister can legislate to prevent employers from deducting trivial amounts from employees? Perhaps I could give an example.

In 1978, when I was a union officer, the Ayrshire and Arran health board, which is not noted for being a good employer, called in the police because it alleged that a woman canteen worker had a pint of milk in her bag. The police charged her and the procurator fiscal in Ayrshire decided that there was no case to answer.

The management sacked the woman, though, so I had to take the matter to an unfair dismissal tribunal. The union's time and resources were tied up. The unfair dismissal tribunal found in favour of the woman to the extent that she got a re-engagement order. For the sake of a pint of milk, the matter trundled on for months. Quite substantial Health Service resources must have been involved. Many of the officials who were sacking the woman for taking the pint of milk must have lifted a telephone from time to time, perhaps to tell their wives that they would be late, and used more of the health board's money than the lady in question.

It must be possible to put something into the Bill to prevent the small minority of employers who would do something so stupid from doing what the Ayrshire and Arran health board did. Had there been such provision, a great deal of money would have been saved.

Mr. Trippier: I do not know the background to the case that the hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin) has mentioned. Perhaps he will elaborate later. I do not know whether the bottle came to be missing intentionally or accidentally.

There must be a clear understanding in a contract that deductions can be made. It may be that, when the matter was drawn to the attention of the industrial tribunal, that understanding was not in the contract so the employer was taking advantage of the position by dismissing the worker without any deduction being allowable under the terms and conditions of service. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman and his trade union colleagues tripped the employer up on that.

The provision in the Bill regarding that is perfectly adequate, and the Government do not wish to intervene further in the relationship between employers and workers.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 4

PROVISIONS SUPPLEMENTARY TO SS. 2 AND 3

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move amendment No. 35, in page 5, line 30, leave out subsection (1) and insert—

'(1) In this section "final instalment of wages", in relation to a worker, means—

(a) the amount of wages payable to the worker which consists of or includes an amount payable by way of contractual remuneration in respect of the last of the periods for which he is employed under his contract prior to its termination for any reason (but excluding any wages referable to any earlier such period), or

(b) where an amount in lieu of notice is paid to the worker later than the amount referred to in paragraph (a), the amount so paid, in each case whether the amount in question is paid before or after the termination of the worker's contract.'.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 36, 37 and 40.

Mr. Trippier: These are a set of technical amendments to the first three subsections of clause 4. The subsections ensure that the limits on deductions to payments related to cash shortages or stock deficiencies established by clauses 2 and 3 do not apply to the final payment of wages.

Mr. Eastham: As the Minister rightly said, these are technical amendments. I was intrigued by the Government's subtle use of the word "instalment", as, originally, the word "payment" was used. I do not understand the reason for that change, and I am always suspicious when sophisticated language is used. As a consequence of that change, how much more will workers lose? I am not a lawyer, and perhaps the answer is obvious to a barrister or solicitor.

I also wish to ask about the reference to "an amount in lieu of notice."

We are sometimes, rightfully, suspicious when an employer decides to get rid of an employee who, if he must leave the premises immediately, is entitled to pay in lieu of notice. I wonder whether the amendment has been drafted in such a way that the accumulation of 10 per cent. deductions, which could be fabricated, could mean that an employer could withhold the pay in lieu of notice, thus practically sending the worker home with nothing. I should be grateful if the Minister could clarify those points for me because I am a little baffled.

Mr. Caborn: I wish to follow that point by asking about people who have accrued holiday pay. Sometimes the accumulation of holiday pay depends on the time served in a company or at a place of work. If holiday pay were to be paid to a person leaving a company, would that also be subject to the type of deduction to which my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham) has referred?

Will the Bill have a different effect if the new type of pay slips which the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced recently were implemented, in which 20 per cent. of one's wages can be tax-free? If so, does that mean that it would also be deduction-free in relation to the 10 per cent.? I should be interested to know the answer, because it might throw a new light on the Bill, given the new wages structure that the Chancellor of the Exchequer apparently wants to introduce.

9.45 pm

Ms. Clare Short: The Minister spoke extremely briefly to the amendments. He did not explain why the Government had introduced them. Perhaps that was because he got into something of a muddle in Committee about what clause 4(1) really meant, about what was covered and about what was included in the final payment of wages. I suspect that the amended drafting is considered to be better, and it probably is. However, it would be interesting to hear the Minister explain its introduction.

We must not let this opportunity pass without saying how strongly we object to the Government's definition of the final payment of wages, and the way in which they have exempted that final payment from any protection, such as the 10 per cent. limitation for a small group of retail workers who are accused of cash shortages or stock deficiencies. The way in which the amendment provides for payment in lieu of notice to be treated is an invitation to an employer to confiscate the whole payment in lieu of notice when someone is being sacked as a result of a dispute. It is outrageous that the Government should invite employers to treat their workers like that. If there is a case for giving a 10 per cent. protection to workers, it also extends to the final payment of wages.

Judging by the way in which the Government have drafted the provision and have drawn attention to money paid in lieu of notice, they are telling employers that, if they decide to sack someone and to accuse them of something that they have not done, they can deduct all the money paid in lieu of notice. The Government are saying that they can do that if they want to be spiteful, and that they will go to great trouble to draft the Bill to enable them to do so. We have here yet another example of the Government's mean-mindedness, which infects every part of the Bill.

Mr. Trippier: That is a bit thick. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) said that the Government were mean-minded. The hon. Lady knows from the amendments that I have tabled that I have been anxious to meet many of the points made in Committee. She has been churlish in remarking on the Government's attitude and my attitude, and has claimed credit every time she thinks that the Labour party has pulled something off. There has been no recognition of the fact that we debated the matter fully in Committee and that I sometimes accepted the points made. That is unfair.

Ms. Clare Short: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Trippier: I shall give way in a moment. The attitude adopted by the hon. Member for Ladywood would not, I am sure, have been adopted by the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo). But I shall try to respond to some of the points made in this short debate.

Ms. Short: It is, perhaps, appropriate that we should fall out at this late stage. But we have made it clear to the Minister throughout that the Bill is rotten. The Bill's whole nasty approach will lead to an increase in poverty among the poorest paid workers in the country. We also made it clear that we did not think that there was much point in simply getting angry with one another. We wanted to make a detailed case against the Bill, and that is what we tried to do in Committee, instead of shouting at one another incoherently.

In the course of that long dispute, some minor concessions were won. We were grateful for every scrap that we could get. Each time we got a scrap, we said that it was a scrap and that it did not affect the fundamentally objectionable nature of the Bill. However, we were grateful for the scraps, because they would protect some workers. That remains the position. The Minister knows it. There has never been any dispute about it. For him to suggest that we are somehow changing our position at this late stage is quite wrong.

Mr. Trippier: I am not suggesting in any way that the Opposition have changed their position. I respect the fact that they have opposed the Bill throughout and, have done so, as far as they were able, in a constructive manner. I am simply saying that I think the hon. Lady has been unfair today. I was referring not to the Opposition, just to the hon. Lady.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) referred to holiday pay. Clause 7 deals with the meaning of wages and what is incorporated in the definition of wages under clause 4. The hon. Gentleman's point is covered in clause 7(1)(a).

I do not agree with the hon. Member for Ladywood when she says that the Opposition do not like the fact that any outstanding moneys which are due to an employer could not or should not be collected on the last day that a payment is made to a worker. If money is due to an employer, it is absolutely right that it should be collected. If there is not sufficient money in the gross pay which is paid in the last payment, it is absolutely right that the employer should have recourse to a court of law, which he does through civil proceedings, for collection of the money, although I suspect, as I have said in Committee, that on many occasions an employer would not go to that trouble.

I am under an obligation to deal with a point raised by the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham). The amendment changes the term "final payment of wages" to "final instalment of wages". Although that is of no legal consequence—I do not want the hon. Gentleman to read anything into this—it conveys more satisfactorily the concept that the payment is the final one in a series of periodic instalments of wages. The amendment also shortens and clarifies the proposed subsection. If the Opposition wish to be consistent—they have said that they like the shorter wording in the Bill—perhaps they will agree to the amendments which are purely technical.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 36, in page 5, line 44, leave out from 'from' to end of line 6 on page 6 and insert

'the worker's final instalment of wages.'.

No. 37, in page 6, line 9, leave out

'payment of wages is made'

and insert

'instalment of wages is paid, but (whether or not the requirements of section 1(2) would otherwise be satisfied with respect to it) his employer shall not be treated as receiving any such payment in accordance with section 1(2) if the payment was first required to be made after the end of the period referred to in section 3(2A)(b).'.

No. 38, in page 6, line 10, at end insert—

'(3A) Legal proceedings by the employer of a worker in retail employment for the recovery from the worker of any amount in respect of a cash shortage or stock deficiency shall not be instituted by the employer after the end of the period referred to in section 3(2A)(b) unless the employer has within that period made a demand for payment in respect of that amount in accordance with section 3.'.

No. 39, in page 6, line 11, leave out from 'that' to 'on' in line 13 and insert

'the employer of a worker in retail employment is (in accordance with section 1(2), as it applies apart from section 3(1)) entitled to receive any amount from the worker'.

No. 40, in page 6, line 21, leave out

'payment of wages is paid'

and insert

No. 42, in page 7, line 6, leave out '(2)'.—[Mr. Trippier.]

Clause 7

MEANING OF "WAGES"

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I beg to move amendment No. 45, in page 9, line 23, at end insert—

'(aa) any payment by way of an advance under an agreement for a loan or by way of an advance of wages (but without prejudice to the application of section 1(1) to any deduction made from the worker's wages in respect of any such advance);'.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No 46, in page 9, line 26, at end insert ', allowance or gratuity in connection with the worker's retirement or as compensation for loss of office;'.

No. 47, in page 9, line 29, at end insert—

'(2A) Where any payment in the nature of a non-contractual bonus is (for any reason) made to a worker by his employer, then, for the purposes of this Part, the amount of the payment shall—

(a) be treated as wages of the worker, and

(b) be treated as payable to him as such on the day on which the payment is made.'.

Mr. Clarke: It is a long time since I have heard technical and drafting amendments debated with such heat, vigour and care on Report, but I hesitate to say that amendments Nos. 45, 46 and 47 are technical amendments. They deal with clause 7 which sets out the definition of wages. They are designed to sort out some confusion in the way loans and advances of wages, lump sums on retirement or loss of office and non-contractual bonuses are treated in the definition of wages. I commend them to the House.

Mr. Nellist: It is only 9.52 pm and I do not wish to disappoint the Paymaster General.

Mr. Speaker: It is no disappointment—the hon. Member has all night.

Mr. Nellist: Hon. Members who have taken part in the debate, which has lasted for about five hours, may be content to leave this group of technical amendments so that their hon. Friends from London can deal with the EEC and parental leave for child care. However, before we conclude, I shall ask the Paymaster General for an explanation of the effects of the Government amendments. It is not good enough, even at the tail end of a long day's debate, to state that the amendments are additions to matters outside the definition of wages. Subsection (2) payments are excluded from subsection (1) sums. There was heated debate in Committee on the sums mentioned in subsection (1), especially about bonuses and piecework rates. My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) moved an amendment on that point. He may think that the points he made then are still worthy of being repeated.

Why are there such large changes in the definitions of wages, especially with respect to the exclusion of benefits in kind, in the Wages Bill 1986 compared with the Truck Act 1831? The original definitions in the Truck Acts are superseded by the provisions in clause 7. There was no mention of many of the benefits in kind which are still pertinent to workers, including tied accommodation, meals on premises and—I hesitate to say this because of our earlier exchanges — company cars, which the Minister assured me were a benefit in kind. By not mentioning those items, does clause 7 mean that they are up for grabs when it comes to deductions? If the deduction is limited to 10 per cent. for specified items, and other items are not mentioned, does that mean that those that are not mentioned can be made the subject of larger deductions by employers, if they wish?

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) is entirely within his rights to ask for a more careful explanation if he is worried about these technical amendments. The starting point of his query was the question: why are we taking such care to draft the definition of wages in this way and moving a little from the definition in the 1831 Act? I remind him that the Bill contains two innovations which make it important that we get the definition right and which will assist those in tribunals and elsewhere who have to apply it.

One innovation is the 10 per cent. limit on the deductions that can be made from the wages of retail workers and the other is the new right of access to an industrial tribunal where there is a dispute about the deductions. It is important, especially in calculating the 10 per cent. limit, to know exactly what that limit is and to have an extremely precise definition of wages. The amendment has been moved because it represents a further attempt to define exactly what is meant by wages and what is excluded.

The hon. Member for Coventry, South-East correctly spotted the fact that all three amendments are concerned with additions to the list of matters which, for the purposes of the Bill, are not to be regarded as wages. Although that may sound disadvantageous, it is not.

On amendment No. 45, by ensuring that loans and advances of wages are not included in the meaning of wages, one reduces the total amount that counts as wages and therefore reduces the amount that the employer can lawfully deduct under the 10 per cent. limit. If loans or advances of wages were permitted to be added to the total sum for the purposes of this definition, the effect would be to weaken the protection to the worker, because 10 per cent. of the lawful deduction would be a higher sum.

Amendment No. 46 defines payment by way of payments that are akin to pensions, which are already excluded in the Bill as originally drafted and which were considered in Standing Committee. We consider that lump sums paid on retirement and sums paid in compensation for loss of office are similar to payments by way of pension. They have been excluded from the definition of wages because we believe that disputes about such matters should be resolved by the courts and are not really within the compass and competence of the tribunals which would otherwise find themselves being drawn into this somewhat complex area.

Mr. Nellist: Will the Minister give way on that point?

Mr. Clark: May I just answer all the hon. Gentleman's queries?

Amendment 47 deals with payments made to a worker by his employer of sums to which the worker is not contractually entitled. It can be called a "non-contractual bonus". When those sums are paid to the worker, they would not, as originally defined in the Bill, count as wages because they are not legally payable. The amendment ensures that, for the purposes of part 1 of the Bill, repayments are treated as wages and subject to the provisions.

Mr. Nellist: Does amendment No. 46 include accrued holiday pay in the payment of money to workers for redundancy and so on?

Mr. Clarke: I had sat down because of the 10 o'clock rule. Holiday pay is already dealt with in the Bill as drafted. In clause 7 on page 9 holiday pay is "wages" for the purpose of this part of the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 46, in page 9, line 26, at end insert—

', allowance or gratuity in connection with the worker's retirement or as compensation for loss of office;'.

No. 47, in page 9, line 29, at end insert—

'(2A) Where any payment in the nature of a non-contractual bonus is (for any reason) made to a worker by his employer, then, for the purposes of this Part, the amount of the payment shall—

(a) be treated as wages of the worker, and

(b) be treated as payable to him as such on the day on which the payment is made.'. — [Mr. Kenneth Clarke.]

Clause 8

GENERAL INTERPRETATION OF PART I

Amendments made: No. 48, in page 10, line 3, leave out 'under his contract'.

No. 49, in page 10, line 5, at end insert—

'and "employed", in relation to a worker, accordingly means employed under his contract;'.

No. 50, in page 10, line 30, at end insert—

'(2A) Where the total amount of any wages that are paid on any occasion by an employer to any worker employed by him is less than the total amount of the wages that are properly payable by him to the worker on that occasion (after deductions) then, except in so far as the deficiency is attributable to an error of computation, the amount of the deficiency shall be treated for the purposes of this Part as a deduction made by the employer from the worker's wages on that occasion.

(2B) In subsection (2A) the reference to an error of computation is a reference to an error of any description on the part of the employer affecting the computation by him of the gross amount of the wages that are properly payable by him to the worker on that occasion.'.

No. 51, in page 10, line 32, leave out 'of his' and insert 'employed by him'.—[Mr. Kenneth Clarke.]

Further consideration of the Bill adjourned. — [Mr. Kenneth Clarke.]

Bill, as amended (in the Standing Committee), to be further considered tomorrow.

Equal Opportunities

Mr. Speaker: I must announce to the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

10.1 pm

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 6871/83, draft proposals for a Directive on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment of men and women in occupational social security schemes, 5825/1/84, draft Directive on the application of the principle of equal treatment for men and women in self employed occupations including agriculture and on protection during pregnancy and maternity, and 4118/86, communication from the Commission to the Council concerning a medium term Community programme (1986/90) on equal opportunities for women; and endorses the Government's commitment to the principle of equal treatment while seeking to ensure that unnecessary burdens are not imposed on business in the United Kingdom.

I welcome this opportunity to debate these European Community documents. The draft directive on equal treatment in self-employment was originally proposed by the European Commission in 1984. We share its underlying objectives but along with several other member states doubt the wisdom of some of the proposals.

Its objectives are the elimination of any direct or indirect discrimination on the ground of sex which has the effect of preventing a person from obtaining a loan or other facilities to set up or run a business; the removal of legal and financial barriers to business partnerships between husband and wife, or the employment of one by the other; the recognition of a spouse's right to build up separate entitlement to maternity, invalidity, social security and retirement benefits; and the creation for such spouses of a legal right to receive consideration for the work they contribute, whether in cash or in some other form.

Of course, the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 already deals with some of these matters. In particular, it makes it unlawful to discriminate in the provision of facilities such as loans on grounds of sex. The other point to stress is that there is now no obstacle in United Kingdom law to prevent spouses establishing a formal business relationship if they wish to do so. So article 5 worries us not at all. The difficulty with the directive lies, I think, in article 7, the detailed requirements of which seem likely to create as many problems as they attempt to solve. It is not in our view sensible to provide the spouse of a self-employed person with a legal right to receive consideration in cash or in kind for the work he or she performs. It is a principle of our legislation that it should not seek to regulate private relationships where there is no intention to create a legal business relationship. I am sure that no hon. Member wants to see husbands and wives taking their housekeeping disputes to the courts, but that could easily be the result of this sort of provision.

No one in the Government under-estimates the importance of self-employment and I am told that the number of self-employed women increased by some 25 per cent. between 1983 and 1985. It is Government policy to create a climate where their enterprise can prosper and to ensure that there are no unreasonable obstacles in their path. As I have said, our law already provides that there should be no discrimination in the provision of services that are essential to the formation of new businesses. In principle, therefore, I think that we would welcome a European measure which made that guarantee of equal treatment in self-employment part of Community law. But I do not think that we could accept a measure which placed an increased and unnecessary burden on small firms and provided for the interference of the law in personal relationships.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): My hon. and learned Friend mentioned Community law. As most of us understand it, the European Community was established to enable free trade between the countries within Europe, which is a fairly sensible thing to do. Does it necessarily follow that we have to have the same legislation as other European countries with regard to men and women and equal opportunities? Are we not grown-up and mature enough to make our own decisions on the matter?

Mr. Waddington: The Community brings forward draft directives, and the member Governments have to make up their mind as to whether the draft directives are justified in view of the terms of the treaty. After that, the member states have to come to a decision whether the proposals put forward by the Commission are reasonable. I have to tell my hon. Friend that this draft directive is currently under discussion by member states at official level. It is likely that it will be amended, possibly quite substantially, before it is submitted to the Council of Ministers for discussion.

Mr. Marlow: I think that my hon. and learned Friend will feel like me, although I am not sure whether he would be prepared to say so. Were he to go round the pubs and working men's clubs and knock on doors in his constituency, and ask people whether this was an appropriate area for the Europeans to bring forward legislation, or whether it would be a more appropriate area for us to consider our own legislation, I think that the latter is the conclusion that he would get.

Mr. Waddington: My hon. Friend has brought forth an important point. Perhaps he will speak on the matter later. I had better stick to the terms of the debate and put to the House the apparent purpose of the draft directives, and then the House can come to its own judgment on them. I think that I have stated the legal position correctly. We are talking only about draft directives. They are now under discussion by officials and eventually the Council of Ministers will have to come to a conclusion on whether to accept them.

I had better move on to the draft directive on equal treatment in occupational social security schemes. The draft directive was issued by the European Commission as part of a continuing programme aimed at the elimination of the unequal treatment of men and women in the Community, and it is designed to bring clarity and, if possible, legal certainty to an area in which the application of equal treatment is often a matter of doubt for both workers and employers. It relates to occupational schemes providing benefits of a social security nature, for example, occupational sick pay schemes. But its main target, and the area where it would seem to have most application, is occupational pensions. Here it requires equality of treatment in access to scheme membership, in the conditions for reimbursement of contributions and the rights to deferred pensions, in the conditions for the grant of benefits and in the setting of levels of benefits and contributions. The directive would also require equality of pension ages and benefits for surviving spouses, but permits the deferment of those provisions until equality in those respects is present in state social security schemes.

Within the United Kingdom there is already legislation that gives a measure of equality to men and women in occupational pensions schemes. The Social Security Pensions Act 1975 provides for equal access to membership, and lays down conditions for the preservation of benefits which apply equally to men and women. But there remain significant differences in the treatment of men and women in relation to pension ages, and survivors' benefits, and actuarial factors are used that reflect differences in the morbidity, mortality or life expectancy of men and women. It is there that the provisions of the draft directive could be of major importance.

In 1976 the Occupational Pensions Board produced its report on equal status for men and women in occupational pensions schemes. After detailed study, the board recommended that, because there is an obvious link between occupational and state schemes, when one comes to the fundamental issues of unequal pension ages and survivors' benefits, equality should not be enforced except in partnership with the state scheme.

This view is also enshrined in the draft directive which permits deferment of the introduction of equal treatment in relation to pension age, and in relation to the provision of benefits for surviving spouses for so long as such differences exist in the state scheme. A provision allowing deferment is welcomed by the Government, provided that it covers all survivors benefits, and also other benefits and provisions which are linked directly to pension ages.

As to actuarial data on the different life expectancy of men and women, the European Commission regards the use of such data as contrary to the principle of equal treatment if used to set different levels of benefit or contributions, but this approach has drawn almost total opposition from pensions practitioners and actuaries, not only within the United Kingdom but in other member states. It is argued, with some force, that actuaries take into account different factors in regard to ill-health, mortality or life expectancy, not simply by convention or through unjustifiable prejudice, but in order to establish the truth. The truth is that women generally live longer than men. Thus, even leaving aside any question of earlier retirement ages for women, their pensions are in payment for longer and, for a given level of benefit, are more expensive to provide. Unless these actuarial differences between men and women are disregarded, equal contributions for men and women provide lower benefits for women. Conversely, for women to receive equal benefits there have to be higher contributions.

This is a very large and complex area and the Government are now in discussion with the Association of British Insurers and others, about the possibility of using unisex actuarial tables in some areas of pensions provision. No conclusions have yet been reached but in the context of the draft directive, it is not essential that they should have been. What is important is whether the directive as drafted is viable in relation to United Kingdom occupational schemes, and in the best interests of men and women in this country; and it seems to us that some changes are needed. First, the directive should not have the effect of prohibiting the proper use of statistical data. Secondly, the directive should apply compulsorily only to periods of membership falling after the operative date of implementation, and those operating schemes should have a reasonable time in which to make the necessary changes to their rules.

The cost involved in the changes will vary from scheme to scheme, depending on their present benefit structure, on the balance of men and women and the measures necessary to implement equal treatment. Since we already have equal access to pension schemes and most benefit-defined schemes provide the same scale of personal benefits to men and women, and since the directive would not require immediate equalisation of provisions for survivors or pension age, the likely costs of a directive modified as outlined in the explanatory memorandum would not be likely to be very great overall.

In considering its response to the draft directive, the Government have consulted widely among those with a direct interest in the subject — those representing practitioners and scheme members. Many of the same bodies submitted evidence to the Select Committee on European Legislation. Inevitably there are differences of opinion, but the approach outlined by the Government in their explanatory memorandum commands considerable support.

Since the issue of the memorandum in August 1987 discussions have been taking place in Brussels. It is apparent that a similar view of the deficiencies of the original draft directive is held by a majority of other member states, and that the approach adopted by the United Kingdom Government offers the best hope of securing agreement.

Mr. Marlow: This is a complex issue and perhaps my hon. and learned Friend will be able to clarify it. Will he confirm that the draft directive applies not just to the provisions that Government will make but to provisions that the private sector pension schemes will make? If that is the case, will he also confirm that if at the moment men and women pay a certain amount for a pension, the whole lot will be thrown into the pot again and either men will have to pay relatively more or they will receive relatively less? Against the actuarial tables that he has been talking about, is not that profoundly unfair?

Mr. Waddington: With respect, we are not dealing with Government pension schemes. The draft directive is on equal treatment in occupational social security schemes. I am sure that my hon. Friend will wish to develop his argument on that in due course, but I must make that plain.

Lastly, let me deal with the second Community action programme on equal opportunities for women for the period 1986-1990, accompanying which was a draft Council resolution which, with some slight modifications, is likely to come before the Council shortly. It is a resolution which the Government would be very pleased to adopt.

We are fully committed to equal opportunities in the labour market and support the general theme of the new action programme. We particularly welcome the attention to education and training policies which expand women's occupational choice and we have already taken many positive steps in the seven areas where the programme recommends action by member states.

Under the first of these seven headings, "Improved Application of Existing Provisions", we can point to the Equal Opportunities Commission's excellent code of practice on employment which came into force last year. Under the second heading, "Education and Training", we can, I believe, claim significant achievements.

On education, Government policy is to continue to work for equal opportunities across all aspects of schools provision and to encourage girls towards higher achievements in those areas of the curriculum where they tend not to participate to their full advantage.

One of the most exciting advances in education in recent years has been the development of school-industry links. One initiative being sponsored by the Government this year is the executive shadows scheme, which the Department of Trade and Industry is running with the Institute of Directors. That will involve a significant number of top business executives — about 750 have joined the scheme so far and we are hoping for many more —being "shadowed" for a week by sixth form students, both girls and boys. In that way they can learn a lot about the opportunities for women in business today.

For older women, the Manpower Services Commission's full range of adult training programmes is open equally to men and women, and women are encouraged to consider non-traditional skills. In addition, the Commission has a small but valuable programme of special training for women. For example, there are some 2,000 places per year on the wider opportunities for women courses.

The third heading of the action programme is "Employment". Here a variety of measures are suggested for member states, including a review of discriminatory legislation, the original purpose of which was protective. We have, in fact, already carried out such a review, as a result of which we have brought forward proposals in the Sex Discrimination Bill to repeal the unnecessary and outdated restrictions on women's hours of work which prevent women being employed in jobs based on shift work or night work.

The programme also outlines the European Commission's continuing commitment to removing discrimination against women from member countries' tax systems. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has recently published a Green Paper on the reform of personal taxation which examines this and other issues. It looks closely at a system of independent taxation with transferable allowances which, in the words of the Green Paper, "would give married women the same opportunity for privacy and independence in tax matters as their husbands".

The next matter referred to in the programme is headed "New Technologies" and the Government agree about the importance of increasing women's representation in occupations involving the new technologies. One of the MSC's priorities in the area of women's training is helping women to train for jobs in which there are actual or forecast skill shortages, and which are of key economic importance. That frequently means jobs involving new technology. The MSC also funds an Open University course for women returning to technological work after a spell away.

The fifth action area in the programme concerns

"social protection and social security".

The Government support the principle of equal treatment for men and women in matters of social security as set out in the 1979 social security directive and have reported to the European Commission on action taken to implement the directive.

The sixth heading is

"Sharing of Family and Occupational Responsibilities".

We support some of the measures proposed under this heading, for example the encouragement of more flexible working hours and of part-time opportunities for either sex. Where we differ from the European Commission is in regard to the draft directive on parental leave and leave for family reasons. The Government cannot accept that an instrument so burdensome on employers and detrimental to job prospects would enhance equal opportunities.

We recognise that many women—and many men—will want to combine family responsibilities with a career, but we believe employers and employees should be left free to agree between them the most suitable working arrangements for their own particular enterprise. Companies are already recognising the need to modify their traditional career patterns to recoup their investment in women. I commend the Engineering Council's report last year on career breaks. That demonstrated the importance of personnel policies that will attract the ablest young women into engineering and showed that many employers would be sympathetic to requests for longer than minimum maternity leave, reinstatement or non-standard working arrangements.

The communication refers to

and rightly stresses the importance of breaking down stereotyped images of men's work and women's work and their respective roles in society. There is much that I could say on that score, but I think that the House will agree that I have spoken long enough.

As must be obvious from all the action already taken in this area and from the list that I gave of measures that are being taken, we do not accept the strictures of the Opposition, as expressed in their amendment. The amendment looks pretty silly when set against the number of Opposition Members who are present to support it. It is a silly and inaccurate amendment, because it refers to "obstruction of equal pay for work of equal value". This Government, unlike the previous Labour Government, have provided for equal pay for work of equal value. I do not know why those who drafted the amendment were silly enough to insert that phrase.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'approves the European Community Documents Nos. 6871/83, draft proposals for a Directive on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment of women and men in occupational social security schemes 5825/1/84, draft Directive on the application of the principle of equal treatment for women and men in self-employ occupations including agriculture and on protection during pregnancy and maternity, and 4118/86, communication from the Commission to the Council concerning a medium-term Community programme (1986/90) on equal opportunities for women; and deplores the Government's lack of commitment to the principle of equal treatment for women and men and equal opportunities for women, as demonstrated by its refusal to implement the directive on parental leave, its obstruction of equal pay for work of equal value, and its failure to extend invalid care allowance to married women.'.

Listening to the Minister one would think that we lived in a perfect world where men and women were equal in all respects and there were no problems apart from the occasional document from the EEC. The fact is that there is considerable inequality in this country between men and women in all aspects of life. The Minister knows that discrimination against women is widespread, and no amount of glossing over the truth will hide that fact.

Mr. Waddington: The hon. Gentleman is entitled to make that remark, but I do not know what bearing it has on my speech. I was not discussing whether there is discrimination; of course there is some discrimination, but I was merely outlining the purpose of the Community documents.

Mr. Dubs: The purpose of the documents is to tackle discrimination in many areas of life in this country. The Minister said that the Government agreed with occasional items in the documents, but were not happy with the general thrust of the documents. The Minister of State made that clear and the Government motion makes it clear, too. The Government ask the House to take note of these documents. They do not say that they approve of them. There is a world of difference between the two.

It is not easy to tackle discrimination. There is no way in which one piece of legislation, no matter how large and wide-ranging, can deal with it. It takes years of effort and pressure slowly, item by item, to reduce discrimination, whether it is discrimination against women or discrimination against black people. The Government's record is not good. On one occasion after another, the Government have resisted the voice of common sense. They have not listened to those who have told them how to prevent discrimination.

There has been a European Court ruling on the Government's attitude towards different retirement ages for men and women. The Government did the absolute minimum to comply with that ruling. The Government have also consistently refused to give the same invalid care allowance rights to women as to men.

When I first looked at the EEC documents I thought that they represented real progress. Then I noted the wording of the Government's motion. They are reluctant even to approve these documents. That is the basis of this debate. If the Government had said that they welcomed these documents and that they would do their best to implement them——

Mr. Marlow: The Government said that.

Mr. Dubs: No, the Government did not say so. The Government have carped and found reasons for rejecting the bulk of the EEC documents. That is why the Opposition have tabled the amendment. The Minister knows that Britain has the worst record of any European country over complying with these types of directives.

I regret that these are EEC initiatives. I should have preferred them to be British initiatives. I am not a particular fan of the Common Market and its many institutions, but when sensible initiatives are put forward I believe that it is better for this country to agree that they are sensible and to adopt them. That is better than carping, because of the source from which they come. That is the basis of some of our disagreements with Conservative Members who sit below the Gangway. If the Government were to produce their own initiatives, we should not have to pay regard to the EEC directives. However, there are no Government initiatives. Therefore, we have to examine the EEC directives.

I shall comment briefly on the three documents. First, I shall deal with the medium term programme. It is a wide and all-embracing programme that is designed to tackle discrimination under many headings during the next few years. Therefore the Minister should have been less lukewarm when he referred to it. Some of the recommendations are sensible and good and they are worth adopting.

The Minister said that there is good integration between formal education and vocational guidance, and that there are good links between the workplace and school. I am not convinced by his argument. There are many areas where improvement is possible. We welcome the code of practice to which the Minister referred. However, it is the only new feature in this area that commends itself to the Opposition. It will make a major difference.

The document also refers to the importance of having women in teaching posts at all levels. The Minister did not refer to this point. The document refers to the need to provide opportunities for women to take training courses and to the need to make such opportunities easier by additional provision for child minding. The document also refers to the need for improved information and to the need for public sector employers to set an example. That is very important, as public sector employers are directly under the Government's control.

Some local authorities have shown useful initiatives on contract compliance. That is a means of bringing pressure to bear upon suppliers to the public sector. Contract compliance is a useful and important innovation, and I regret that the Government have not sought to adopt it. The Minister expressed support for it, but he was then told that this was not the direction in which the Government were going.

The document also refers to improving the opportunities for women in decision making. I think that that is well worth while, although it also refers to the

and I wonder whether that is as much in the Government's power as the directive suggests.

The document contains a useful suggestion about providing help for the disadvantaged, single parents and migrants — we would refer to members of the disadvantaged black community. It also refers to home workers. It contains a welcome suggestion about giving women greater opportunities in the new technologies.

Some of us were on the bus in the Members' Car Park last Monday inspecting an exhibition sponsored jointly by the Equal Opportunities Commission and British Gas introducing a scheme — "Women into Science and Engineering." I found it interesting that schoolgirls were so enthusiastic about computers and other aspects of science. That is a welcome development. I do not see why science, technology and computer studies should be the prerogative of boys. Some of the girls on the bus came from Wandsworth. They were full of enthusiasm and were determined not to allow boys to steal a march on them. That is an isolated initiative. I regret that there are not more.

The document refers to sharing family and occupational responsibilities, to parental leave and to schemes to improve leave for family reasons. I regret that the Government consistently say that they will not adopt such sensible proposals. The Minister talked in generalities. He said that the schemes were good but that the Government were against specific suggestions such as those on parental leave.

I welcome the document on equal treatment for people in self-employed schemes. I understand what the Minister said about the problem of legal arrangements between spouses, but the document contains many other useful proposals. The EEC says that the Government would have full discretion to implement the proposals in the best way appropriate to national circumstances. The document breaks new ground and makes useful proposals which would improve women's lot.

The occupational schemes initiative is worth while in terms of equal treatment for men and women when hit by sickness, invalidity, old age, accident, occupational disease and unemployment. A number of clear suggestions are made about action which should not be acceptable if equal treatment is to be the norm.

I regret the Government's attitude. I regret that the Government pay lip service to equal treatment for men and women. The Government say, "Yes. If it is easy we shall do it", but if there is any difficulty they capitulate and say no.

The Minister made a sorry speech. The women of our country will be angry and will regret that the Government have turned their back on a number of useful initiatives. The women of our country will not accept that and it is time that the Government realised it.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): I disagree with almost everything that the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) said. I welcome the Minister's wise words. One always worries in such debates that the Minister will have to kow-tow to spurious ideas of equality and that some of the dafter notions about how to achieve equality will be on their lips. I am glad that my hon. Friend the Minister is more robust than that.

Tonight we are discussing three directives. I shall set aside the draft directive on equality in self-employment, because from what I have read of it we are already carrying out most of it—especially on equality of access to loans. The hon. Member for Pattersea should know that, because it was his Government who passed that legislation some 11 years ago. In law and in practice, the bulk of the suggestions in the directive have been carried out in this country for a long time.

I wish to concentrate on occupational pensions and on the overall Community action programme for equal opportunities for women. I note in passing that it proposes to spend 2·6 million ecu on the latter by the year 1990. I suspect that such groups as the late lamented GLC women's committee, which managed to spend £16 million before its demise, could show the Community a thing or two, yet it did not bring about a scrap of additional equality in this city.

Mr. Marlow: My hon. Friend mentioned the late and unlamented GLC women's committee. As she has read and understands all the detail of the legislation, can she advise me whether it would be possible to have a women's committee without also having a men's committee?

Mrs. Currie: I refer my hon. Friend to the Minister, who is not only fully briefed by his Department but is a learned member of the law and therefore better able than I to advise my hon. Friend.

I wish especially to discuss pensions. Like most women Members, I take a close interest in my pension entitlement. I am statistically more likely to draw it than my male colleagues, and for far longer. Therefore, I take a close interest in pensions. My oldest constituent is a lady who will soon celebrate her 106th birthday. She has been drawing a pension for 70 years, and is taken to collect her pension by her son, who will be 87 this year. That is a fate that I suspect will befall a good number of the female members of our community, but precious few of the male members.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): If the equality of opportunity to live the sort of stressful life that is commonplace among men is extended to women, does my hon. Friend believe that women will continue to enjoy this ext

Mrs. Currie: Naturally and absolutely—it as been like that since Bible days and beyond, and it looks as though it will be like that for a few more millennia.

The occupational pensions draft directive seeks completely to ignore the differences in demography between men and women. The European Commission considers that the use of statistics relating to ill-health or life expectancy that differ for the two sexes is contrary to the principle of equal treatment if used to set different levels of benefit or contribution. Yet male and female mortality rates are different and women do live longer than men. One might as well try to abolish the real world.

I call in evidence professor David Wilkie, research actuary at Standard Life Assurance in Edinburgh. Back in November 1983 he warned of "enormous difficulties in the crude implementation of a principle of equality. This was quite inappropriate for funded schemes."

He was absolutely right.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): The hon. Lady referred to life expectancy being different, but the report from the Comission states:

"differences in life expectancy are very clear-cut between categories of male workers, according to the occupation pursued: if account is not generally taken of them in calculations it is difficult to see why an exception should be made only in the case of female workers."

Does not the hon. Lady agree with that?

Mrs. Currie: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will wait until the last few words of my speech, when I shall take up some of his points.

If women want equality of treatment, they must earn it. They are earning it substantially because more than 60 per cent. of women are working, and more than 70 per cent. of those of my generation are doing so. We now form over 41 per cent. of the work force, and the percentage is rising. We have been mightily successful in the new forms of employment that have become available in recent years as we seem to be taking the bulk of the new jobs.

If women want equality of treatment, they must pay for it. They must earn it and pay for it, and that is where it gets harder. I suspect that many of my sisters are not willing to pay. Many of the women who are working now are paying little or no tax and low-level or no national insurance contributions. By far the largest bulk of women currently drawing pensions are doing so on their husbands' contributions and not on their own. National insurance contribution law changed in the mid-1970s, but it will be many years before a full generation of women are drawing state pensions that are based entirely on their own contributions and not those of their husbands.

My hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State mentioned the Green Paper on personal taxation, which proposes transferable allowances. That was widely welcomed, but one of the implications for the 2 million women who are currently paying no tax on their earnings is that they will have to do so in future. They will not like that, and they will not thank my hon. and learned Friend or any of my colleagues for the equality that they are buying.

Many of the calls by women for equality of treatment ignore the whole question of paying for it. It is part of the general malaise of the British people that we all want the services but think that there is a special tree growing in No. 10 Downing street that has little golden apples on it that will allow someone else to pay.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): The hon. Lady is presenting a picture of women not wanting to pay. Is she aware that, because the Government are putting such emphasis on increasing part-time jobs, with most of them going to women, most women do not earn enough to be called upon to pay contributions?

Mrs. Currie: The hon. Gentleman has put my argument in a slightly different way. If and when the time comes and the rules are changed and women are required to pay tax and national insurance contributions, every Member of this place will have a postbag full of letters from women saying, "If this is equality, I do not want it." I look forward to the day when they will say, "We want this and we are prepared to pay for it."

Mr. Field: That will occur only when women have the chance to obtain full-time jobs.

Mrs. Currie: They do have the chance. We all have the chance. These opportunities are taken up.

If we want equality, it will cost us. If we believe in equality, we should be willing to pay. If we are not the bulk of the work force but we are the bulk of dependants, we must accept inequality, which cheerfully and wickedly works in our favour—in other words, it is the men who are paying—or start digging deeper into our handbags. That is a reality that we must begin to face. Whatever the Common Market says, the demography will not go away, and neither will the inexorable logic that that imposes.

We see exactly the same double-think in employment protection. We have heard about the sex discrimination Bill that is to be introduced this year, which will remove the protection that prevents women from working at night and in certain occupations. Women in my constituency have told me, especially those who are breadwinners, that they welcome the proposed change. They would like to see the restrictions removed, but self-appointed women's groups are talking about women being at risk and how dangerous and difficult it will be if women have to work at night or undertake the sort of dreadful work that some men have to do. There are howls of rage on those grounds.

It seems that my hon. and learned Friend the Minister is on a hiding to nothing, but I wish him well. I should like to see the present restrictions removed and to see competent people, whether male or female, take their place in the job market as they will, wherever possible. I support him on that, but I warn him that he will find himself up against the women's groups, which are all so keen to have the directive on equality which is causing the changes to be brought about.

I long for a world in which we no long see the words "man" and "woman" in every piece of legislation that is written. I would prefer a world in which we see people —collections of individuals—with their own ambitions and abilities. Each person should be encouraged — I agree with some of what has been said this evening—to make his or her best efforts and the best contribution that he or she can make to our society. I want a world in which family responsibilities are taken seriously by all the members of the family, preferably before the family actually arrives, and in which those responsibilities are shared not in an artificial way, not in the way that is set out in the directive, but according to the tastes, abilities and interests of all concerned. That is the true path to equality of recognition and equality of achievement for women in Europe, and I commend it to the House.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): In the two years that I have been a Member of this House there have been few debates on equality between men and women, and they have always been greeted with ridicule by Conservative Members. This is a serious subject that ought to be debated properly. I remember my hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) speaking about parental leave. Her speech was rubbished throughout by Conservative Members who refused to give her a fair hearing. I hope that we have some semblance of a decent debate today. If hon. Members have nothing better to do than ridicule and make fun of serious proposals, they should leave now.

The Government's attitude to equality between the sexes is clear from their being prepared only to take note of the various Community documents. The Government have almost always had to be prompted by legal action in the Community even to begin to amend the sex discrimination and equal pay legislation, which was progressive in its time, but which have loopholes that have been described time and again. The Government are dragging their feet on the Sex Discrimination Bill in the other place. Discussions in the Community on further directives or legislation to promote equality will obviously not be treated seriously.

In 1981, the Equal Opportunities Commission recommended 25 amendments to the Sex Discrimination Act 1975. The Government have accepted only three. That shows how seriously they take the subject. They have accepted the equal pay recommendation, which is to widen the definition of equal pay on which a claim can be based. The Government are also accepting the reference to collective agreements and the reference to include small firms and undertakings.

Anyone who has followed what has happened in the European Court of Justice can only be ashamed by the attitude of Britain, which is depicted by Conservative Members who do not understand what proposals are being made, cannot be bothered to listen to the arguments and have never taken the subject seriously while they have been in the House.

Those who have experience of being in the European Parliament can only feel ashamed that Britain has appeared before the European Court of Justice on sex discrimination issues more than any other EC country. I do not know how the Minister expects to be believed when he says that the Government are full of good intentions, bearing in mind the Government's refusal since 1979 to tighten loopholes in the sex discrimination and equal pay legislation.

Miss Helen Marshall, the retired dietician, is the most recent in a long line of women who have caused the European Court of Justice to pronounce Britain's equality laws as leaving women far from equal with men. She fought for six years against her enforced retirement at an earlier age than if she had been a man doing the same job in the National Health Service. The Government have acted with some speed to implement that particular ruling against the compulsory retirement of women at the age of 60, but it is a pity that they did not see fit to rectify the anomaly until ordered to do so by a court outside the United Kingdom. When the Sex Discrimination Bill is suitably amended, probably this summer, women will have the legal right to stay at work until they are 65.

That is a far cry from the early 1970s, when Britain seemed to be at the forefront of those giving women more equal status, particularly at work. The key legislation was the Equal Pay Act 1970 and the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 — both infants of a Labour Government. The European Commission has taken a much more genuinely equal view of women's status through a series of directives which the Government have repeatedly refused to implement. Britain has been one of the states most prone to drag its feet to obey them. A series of defeats at the European Court of Justice has torn both those Acts asunder, leaving Britain with a poor image on equality.

It is worth looking briefly at some of the background. Article 119 of the Treaty of Rome states that men and women should receive equal pay for equal work. Pay is defined as the ordinary basic or minimum wage or salary and any other consideration in cash or kind which the worker receives from the employer. The Council of Ministers has also adopted three directives on sex equality at work. The 1975 equal pay directive sets the principle of equal pay for equal work. The 1976 equal pay treatment directive aims to overcome sex discrimination in the hiring of staff, in vocational training, and in promotion and working conditions. It also forbids sex discrimination, particularly in connection with marital or family status. That directive was breached by Miss Marshall's enforced retirement at a younger age than a man.

The 1979 social security directive forbids discrimination over contributions or entitlements to social security and benefit schemes. The British Equal Opportunities Commission and the European Court have highlighted time after time Britain's failure to treat women equally, although many other EEC states have also been found dragging their feet.

I shall not go through all the incidents in which the United Kingdom has been dragged before the European Court of Justice, but the court ruled against Britain in 1982. As a result, Britain had to amend the Equal Pay Act. Since 1 January 1984 women have been entitled to equal pay for work of equal value. Contrary to what the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) seems to believe—I suggest she looks at the new earnings survey 1984—women were still earning less than men in 1984 in a range of occupations, including those where the concept of equal value is easy to assess. Recently, the EC backed a test case where a cook from Cammell Laird claimed her training and work was of equal value to that of other craftsmen in the company. That case will be dealt with shortly. If that cook wins, the Equal Pay Act will be redundant in all but name. Women will once again have scored a victory, with enormous cost implications for private and public sector employees.

Mrs. Currie: I should be grateful if the hon. Lady would explain how insisting on higher pay for women will aid the promotion of employment for women. Will it not result in many of those good ladies losing their jobs because their employers cannot afford to keep them on?

Mrs. Clwyd: The hon. Lady has missed the whole point. I was arguing not for higher pay for women but for equal pay for women doing equal work. If she had looked at the new earnings survey, she would have seen that women's earnings as a percentage of men's earnings in a whole range of occupations are much lower. That is the point. We want equal pay for equal work. I was not arguing for higher earnings.

Mr. Cohen: The hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) implied that higher pay meant job losses. But does not the privatisation of, say, hospital cleaning mean lower pay and fewer jobs?

Mrs. Clwyd: I thank my hon. Friend for that intervention. The information from Conservative Central Office is obviously not as good as the Labour party's information, which is contained in "Women, Low Pay and Employment Protection". If Conservative Members want to know the facts about low pay and the employment of women, they should look at a copy of that document. They might find it very useful, and discover what low pay is all about.

The policies of the European Commission can be effective only if national Governments have the will to implement them. I believe that organisations and individuals have a role in putting pressure on their Governments. The United Kingdom Government are the only Government, of course, planning to exercise a general veto on the parental leave measure. [Interruption.] Nine other EC countries have already introduced various forms of parental leave. Thus, once again, this country is dragging its feet. I hope that those women who listen to the debate or who read about it tomorrow will write to some of the reactionary Conservative Members present and spell out their views on this important issue.

Nowhere are these European Community policies needed more than in the United Kingdom. Three important directives are returning to the Council of Ministers for ratification in June. All three have been blocked by the United Kingdom Government in the past.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Well, they have done something right, anyway.

Mrs. Clwyd: It is interesting to hear Conservative Members say how much they approve of blocking measures for equal treatment for men and women— [Interruption.] I hope that their constituents are listening. The first directive proposes equal treatment for men and women in occupational security schemes. The second introduces protection for self-employed women during pregnancy and motherhood, and the third covers parental leave. No doubt the Government will again be dragged screaming and kicking in front of the European Court of Justice for failing to implement EC directives when they become law. If the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South has read the new report of the Equal Opportunities Commission, which clearly showed the amount of sex discrimination in recruitment, she cannot possibly believe the arguments that she put forward. That report found that most employers still saw jobs in terms of men's or women's work. They specifically seek women to fill the jobs offering lower pay, and poor promotion prospects.

The report said that employers neither understood nor were they concerned with upholding the sex discrimination legislation. The research took 10 years. It was very thorough. I do not think that even Conservative Members would dispute the findings. For almost half the vacant jobs, the employer already had in mind the sex of the person to fill the post, even though 86 per cent. of the jobs attracted applicants of both sexes. Discrimination occurred between men and women according to the characteristics of the jobs. Employers preferred women for the jobs with lower pay, fewer promotion prospects and where work colleagues and supervisors were female.

Let us not argue for one moment that women receive equal treatment. That is simply not true in terms of pay, social security and a range of provisions. I wish that Conservative Members would try, for once, to conduct a reasonable debate on this important issue. I am sure that women electors in their constituencies will show their disdain for the way in which they treat problems that affect those women, and their disdain for the way in which they treat them in the House. I think that it is disgraceful, and Conservative Members should be ashamed of themselves.

11.1 pm

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): I endorse many of the thoughtful and correct comments of hon. Members whatever their party. [Interruption.] I think that we would agree that it is rather sad that the public school boy hooligans are out in force tonight.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): They are not public school boys. They are a poorly educated lot.

Mr. Kennedy: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. It may be an unfair reflection on public schools. [Interruption.] If Conservative Members will allow me to to do so, I shall endorse many of the points and thoughts that the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) put forward.

Mr. Budgen: Has the hon. Gentleman heard the arguments before?

Mr. Kennedy: I noticed that the hon. Gentleman breezed in half way through the debate. I hardly think that he is in a position to make such a comment. The hon. Member for Cynon Valley made a lengthy speech. I shall be curtailed from doing so because the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) wishes to contribute before the winding-up speeches begin. I think that we should conclude on a high note of levity.

The hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) put forward her view of the legislation. She told us that it was up to society to treat people as people and that such legislation was not necessarily helpful. It is worth remembering that the hon. Members for Cynon Valley and for Derbyshire, South, are in this institution, very much the exception rather than the rule in terms of their sex and their membership of the House. In considering in detail, as the documents do, the need to change not only attitudes but Government policies to provide fairer treatment and opportunities for men and women, we need look no further than the House of Commons, which is one of the most drastically unrepresentative institutions in western Europe. [Interruption.] Conservative Members should remember that, earlier this week, the alliance was delighted to welcome a lady into the House of Commons as one of our Members of Parliament.

I endorse the view that the Minister's opening speech was somewhat disappointing. The Government have given a lukewarm response to the draft directives. It is strange that the remaining bastions of liberal thought, as they affect legislation in this country, are invariably the House of Lords, the High Court and European legislation or directives. Little innovative or progressive work in these matters is initiated in the House of Commons by the Government. Time and again we find ourselves at this hour of the night debating draft directives and alterations to statutory instruments which are the result of external pressure on the Government, not a positive desire by the Government to promote policies on sex discrimination which should have broad support and in which Parliament should show the lead. This is a matter for all parties, not one party or one side of the House.

The Government's reluctance to give these documents the wholehearted approval which they should have is very much related to the point made by the pensions industry on the implications of equal treatment on existing United Kingdom legislation. The Government may take cognisance of the views of the pension industry and reflect its concerns about the possible effects of these directives if enacted in Britain. However, I wish that they had been willing to give so much attention to that industry's views when they reformed the state earnings-related pensions scheme. If the Government were a little more consistent and less selective in listening to and ignoring the views of financial institutions, they might have had slightly more credibility in advancing this argument. The Government's response is disappointing. We cannot and will not support it.

We accept that, in taking a rational look at the horrendous long-term costs of pension provision, there cannot be overnight reform. No one suggests that there can be. The Minister rightly emphasised that point. If we want the principle of equality of treatment, as opposed to equality of access which we have under existing legislation, and want greater sexual equality through our institutions and our legislation, we must start to be more committed and wholehearted and stop waiting for Europe, the courts or the House of Lords to tell us how to make our decisions.

Until we have a House of Commons that reflects more accurately the breakdown of society into two sectors, it is highly unlikely that we shall have a Government who are as committed as they should be. Until that day comes, I doubt that this Government will bring forward the type of legislation that we want. On that basis, the Goverment's response is inadequate and disappointing, and we shall not support it.

11.8 pm

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): When I first became a Member, I may have been a little naive and a little simple—[Interruption.] I thought that that would get them going, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I believed that Governments could decide and choose what legislation they wanted to bring forward. I did not realise the extent to which outside lobbies, bodies and foreign institutions were able to bully, cajole and press Governments into bringing forward the sort of nonsense that we are considering. As a member of a Conservative governing party which was elected on the platform of less law, I am appalled that this sort of nonsense has been brought before us tonight. If I had brought a random sample of my constituents here to watch our proceedings and they had seen that we were discussing this issue, not because we in the United Kingdom wanted to discuss it, but because we had been told by Europeans to do so, they would have been appalled and amazed.

Europe is about trade and co-operation. It is not about Socialism. It is not about imposing complex legislation of a pan-European nature on social issues. I understand that day by day, week by week and month by month, the Labour party is becoming more enamoured of the European Community. We understand why; because of the bureaucracy there and because of the ability to espouse Socialism and force Socialism on this country from the institutions on the other side of the Channel.

We heard a lot from the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) about the European courts, and she is ashamed that we are made to take measures because of the European Court. I will tell the hon. Lady, as the vast majority of my constituents would tell her, that we could not give a fig for European courts. We are legislatively mature enough and long enough in the tooth to decide on our own social policy, our own measures and our own laws, and it is only right that we should make our own laws without having advice and influence from overseas.

The hon. Lady, who took about 20 minutes of the House's time, was going on about discrimination against women. What about discrimination against men? When men get the pension at the same age as women, I will pay a little more attention to what the hon. Lady says. When we act fairly towards men who suffer divorce and whose ex-wives, who are in receipt of finance from them, go and live with other men and still get the full divorce settlement from their husbands, although their husbands have other children to look after, then I will listen to the hon. Lady. If we are to have no discrimination—it is not possible, because men and women are different and long may it remain so — let us have no discrimination in both directions.

We believe in the market in this party, and we believe in the private sector. The private sector provides pensions, just like the private sector provides insurance. If someone insures a sports car, he pays more because the chances are that he is more likely to have an accident. If he has a red car, he pays more for the insurance, because he has been assessed as being more likely to have an accident. Women live longer than men. If women are to get a better deal on pensions, and there is only a certain amount of money available, it means that men will get a less good deal. That is unfair to men.

It is nonsense. It is against the interests of this country. We will make up our own minds.

11.12 pm

Ms. Jo Richardson (Barking): The speech of the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) was no laughing matter. I wonder where the Conservatives of Northampton, North found the hon. Gentleman. I wonder, too, why, when there is any possibility—there are few —of a debate in the House on equality, it brings out the chauvinistic, not to say sexist, bores in the Conservative party. I hope that television cameras will come into the House soon, so that the behaviour of hon. Members on the Bench below the Gangway will be seen by their constituents. They would not remain here for much longer.

This is a serious matter and I make no apology for taking it seriously, as the Government took it seriously in tabling the motion. It seeks support from the House for the Government's singular failure to implement the Community's first action programme, which began at the end of December last year. Moreover, by endorsing the Government's record and approach to equal treatment, the motion seeks to congratulate a Government who have played a prime role in blocking and obstructing progress and agreement in this area in Europe, and who have obstinately deferred and unnecessarily complicated all practical, progressive measures that have been forced on them by the European courts.

The Minister of State, Home Office, ridiculed us for including in our motion. We did that deliberately. That concept was introduced after the Government had been dragged through the European Court and were brought kicking and squealing into this Chamber not wanting to introduce it at all. The Government introduced it in such a complicated and obstructive form that it is almost impossible for women to take claims before the court.

"equal pay for work of equal value"

It is important that we support the call for approval and implementation of the directives. If we do not, we cannot be sure that the Government will support the medium-term Community programme for 1986-90. The Government have done hardly anything, in spite of what the Minister said, in the programme for 1982-85. In the introduction of the medium-term programme the Commission noted that the programme can be realised only if it is supported by the "political will" of all the parties, particularly the member states. I have no love for the European Community and I agree with those, including the hon. Member for Northampton, North, who say that we should introduce our own legislation. However, we are not introducing our own legislation. Therefore, we have no other option but to try to bring to the attention of the House the legislation going through other parliaments.

The Government do not have the political will. If they did they would have set out approval of the documents in their motion. Among the 16 actions set out in the 1982-85 programme, the Commission has stressed the importance of adopting the draft directives based on them as a demonstration of that political will and commitment. We all know that the directive on parental leave was emasculated by the Council of Ministers before it ever came to us and, to the eternal shame of the Conservative Benches, it was rejected by the House in November 1985. Not only have the Government refused to adopt the diluted proposals for parental leave, but they have actively withdrawn support for child care and other services for adult or handicapped dependants by restricting local authority and health authority spending.

The other two directives we are asked to underline tonight have already been mentioned. One is about helping the problems of farmers' wives. In my view, that directive does not go far enough, because the families of farmers as well as their wives do much unpaid labour and that should be taken into account. The Commission also calls for the implementation of the directive drawn from action 4, the aim of which was to achieve equal treatment in ocupational social security schemes.

It has not gone unnoticed that the Government have seen fit to point out that equal treatment does not preclude reducing benefits for one sex rather than increasing them for another. The Tory Administration has been an abysmal failure in this policy area. One has only to look at the so-called Fowler review of social security—heralded as the most comprehensive review since Beveridge — the European ruling on the Marshall case, referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) and at the Advocate General's guidance on the extension of invalid care allowance for married and cohabiting women.

The Government have disregarded not only the views of the European Commission but the views of their own Equal Opportunities Commission, as well as the views of many distinguished women's groups and organisations throughout the country and in Europe. They have insisted upon retaining and consolidating the breadwinner concept and aggregation, which constitute and perpetuate indirect discrimination against women.

[Ms. Jo Richardson]

Similarly, the Commission's proposal on action point 8, to end discrimination against pregnant women, has been flagrantly flouted by the Government. They have launched an unprecedented attack on all maternity benefits, through the Fowler review and their proposals for so-called reform of statutory maternity allowance.

Strangely, although perhaps not really so strangely, coming from this Government, who have so consistently used equality as a mask for worsening the conditions of women and men—we have only to look at the ill-fated Shops Bill and the Wages Bill—the Government have grasped only one of the action points, and are seeking to abolish protective legislation in the Sex Discrimination Bill, which has been through the House of Lords and is coming to the House shortly. That will worsen the position of women.

It is not surprising that the Government seek to ignore the Commission's better recommendations by merely noting them. They expose the only real strategy that the Government have in relation to women. It is, under the guise of economic necessity, to block all advance and, wherever possible, to undermine existing achievements. I cannot put it better than a paragraph of the 12th report of the Select Committee on European Legislation, on 26 February 1986, which states that the Government

"conclude that any further legislative burdens on employers must be considered in the light of their likely detrimental effect on job creation and hence on equal opportunities, and consequently will seek to ensure that any resolution adopted by the Council contains no unacceptable commitments as to further directives."

In other words, the Government, in the name of lifting so-called burdens from employers, blame equal opportunities for their failure to tackle unemployment. In short, they are making women pay for the failure of their economic policies; it is that economic, social and political fact that our amendment seeks to expose. I invite my right hon. and hon. Friends to support me in the Lobby against the Government.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Ian Lang): The debate has ranged wider than the three European Community proposals concerning equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women. Even the three proposals cover the responsibilities of at least three different Government Departments, but I shall try to answer as many of the points that have been raised as I can in the time that remains.

I should like to begin by reaffirming the Government's commitment, as the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) seems to be in some doubt, both to the principle of equal opportunities and equal treatment for men and women, and to action to help make it a reality. Of course, there is a long way to go, but we have already passed some milestones. Today there are nearly 11 million women economically active in Great Britain, making up some 40 per cent. of the labour force. The United Kingdom has the second highest female labour force participation rate in the European Community after Denmark, with about 60 per cent. of women of working age economically active, as my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) said in an excellent speech.

The United Kingdom accounted for more than half the Community's total female employment growth between 1983 and 1984. The number of women in full-time jobs rose by 17,000 in the year to September 1985, and the number in part-time jobs by nearly 180,000.

I think that all hon. Members recognise the Government's achievements in the sphere of training, particularly youth training. The youth training scheme is particularly significant for girls, who have obtained only a tiny share of traditional apprenticeships. In the one-year scheme, for example, 80 per cent. of all young women on the scheme were in employer-led provision, gaining direct experience of industry and commerce. In two-year YTS, with its increased vocational focus, all young people will have the opportunity to acquire a vocational qualification or a credit towards one. That will revolutionise the opportunities which 16-year-old girls leaving school have until now had to obtain such qualifications.

Last December, the Youth Training Board endorsed a package of measures designed to challenge sex-stereotyping in YTS and further encourage girls to consider training opportunities in occupations in which they are under-represented. The package includes encouraging providers to set up single-sex schemes in occupational areas not traditional to women.

The Manpower Services Commission is also promoting equality of opportunity in vocational training in a number of other ways. For example, it is currently involved in the programme of "Women's Training Roadshows" touring the country under the auspices of the Women's National Commission. The roadshows are exhibitions aimed at encouraging girls and women to consider careers not traditionally associated with their sex, particularly science and technology-related careers.

The hon. Member for Battersea referred to the bus that set off from Westminster on Monday. I helped to send that bus off under the auspices of the WISE scheme—women into science and engineering. There is also a scheme known as WOW intended to give wider opportunities for women. The Government are also bringing forward the Sex Discrimination Bill which will shortly come to the House for Second Reading. We have also, of course, supported the Equal Opportunities Commission's code of practice of 1985.

The hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) referred to women's pay and complained that insufficient progress was being made towards equalisation of pay rates. She might like to know that average weekly earnings for full-time adult employees since 1979 have risen by 93 per cent. for men and for women by 99 per cent. There is a divergence of 6 per cent. at a time when the inflation rate rose by some 75 per cent.

The hon. Member for Cynon Valley also referred to the Helen Marshall case. Of course, if the Social Security Pensions Act 1975, brought in by a Labour Government, had provided for equality in retirement, Miss Marshall would never have had to resort to the European Court.

Mrs. Clwyd: This is 1986. Where has the Minister been in the meantime?

Mr. Lang: The hon. Lady also referred to the United Kingdom blocking the occupational pensions directive. I must tell the hon. Lady that we are not blocking that directive. The approach adopted by the Government, and outlined in their explanatory memorandum, commands considerable support among other member states. It offers the best hope of securing a directive. Also, we are not blocking the directive on the self-employed. There is certainly disagreement over some of the provisions that it contains from a number of countries, but we hope that a suitable draft can be achieved. We are simply trying to amend those aspects which are unworkable.

Special training for women is being offered by an increasing number of institutions which my colleagues and I have designated under section 47 of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 which allows training to be restricted to one sex only where it is for work in which members of that sex are seriously under-represented or where the trainees have been out of the labour market for some time discharging domestic or family responsibilities. To date, some 150 bodies have received such designation —all but one of them since the Government came to power. In 1985, the United Kingdom topped the European league for women's training, with 92 projects obtaining social fund money. Second came Italy with 13 projects.

With regard to the parental leave directive, to which the Opposition"s amendment referred, of course the Government recognise that domestic responsibilities are a constraint on pursuing a career for many women, at least for a time. But reconciling child care with employment is not a problem to which there is a single solution suitable to be imposed by legislation. Indeed, there are a number of possible solutions, and parental leave itself is only a temporary and partial one.

The Opposition amendment also referred to the equal pay for work of equal value directive, to which the hon. Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) also referred. I cannot understand what the Opposition mean in the amendment when they draw attention to the Government's obstruction to equal pay for work of equal value. The Government amended the Equal Pay Act 1970 in 1983 to provide for equal pay for work of equal value following the judgment of the European Court of Justice. The original Act, which was introduced by the Labour Government, did not fully implement European law on that matter. I stress that the Opposition did not choose to include the concept of equal value in the Act that they introduced in 1970.

The Opposition are in no position to criticise the Government. The same story applies if we consider the invalid care allowance. That is currently the subject of a reference to the European Court of Justice to ascertain whether the EEC directive on equal treatment in social security matters applies to that allowance.

We have not yet received the court's judgment—it is expected next month—but the Government have made their position quite clear. We have a good record in complying with the directive and in removing discrimination from schemes — discrimination which was often introduced by the previous Labour Government, as was the exclusion of married women from the invalid care allowance. We have often gone further than the strict terms of the directive.

Equal treatment for men and women in occupational pensions is a principle which few would argue against. There can be as little justification for inequality here as in any other area of economic activity where men and women work side by side, but there is a basic problem in applying the principle of equal treatment to occupational pensions. It is to decide what "equality" means. There is no shortage of opinion and assertion on the question; some of it is informed and some of it is expert, but, regrettably, much of it is neither.

Social Security Reform

11.42 pm

Mr. Andrew Bowden (Brighton, Kempton): With your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and that of the House, I wish to present a petition on behalf of about 1,000 people, most of whom live in Brighton.

The petition states:

That legislation based on the "Reform of Social Security—Programme for Action" White Paper would be extremely detrimental to the residents of the United Kingdom who are in receipt of social security benefits.

Wherefore your petitioners pray that your Honourable House do not pass legislation arising out of the "Reform of Social Security" White Paper.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will every pray.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): With your permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and that of the House, I wish to present a petition similar to that presented by the hon. Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Mr. Bowden) from the Springburn Elderly Forum about social security reform. The forum was formed recently and consists of senior citizens who are fighting to ensure that the pensioners' case is put properly to Parliament and to everyone who is responsible for their welfare. It gives elderly people the opportunity to discuss their problems.

The petition has in excess of 2,000 signatures, and was organised by Mrs. Rose MacCallum of 85 Broomknowles road in my constituency. The petition is against the White Paper for the reform of social security, and states:

"The Humble Petition of the Residents of the Constituency of Glasgow, Springburn Sheweth That the proposed changes in Social Security Benefits would be harmful to the people of this country.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House reject these proposals. And your Petitioners, as in duty bound will ever pray &c.

To lie upon the Table.

Board and Lodging Regulations (Midlothian)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Boscawen.]

11.45 pm

Mr. Alex Eadie (Midlothian): The subject of the debate — the operation of the board and lodging regulations in Midlothian—is causing great anxiety in my constituency. It is fair to say that that anxiety is widespread throughout the country.

The problem I face as a constituency Member for Parliament arises from statutory instrument No. 613, driven through the House by the Government's majority last year, entitled "Supplementary Benefit Regulations 1985". It is commonly referred to as board and lodging allowances, and I wish to discuss its effect on the elderly in 24-hour care in registered nursing homes.

The problem with payments arose when the Government introduced new restrictions on DHSS payments. We were told that they were aimed at the so-called Costa del Dole—young people living in coastal towns. However, they also set a new limit of £170 a week on payment of nursing home fees.

Even on the later aspect, it is claimed that the order is defective. It is not a new experience for this Government to find their orders defective. Indeed, they have been brought before the courts to be told so.

The bitter experience that I shall relate to the House should give the Minister and his Government great cause for concern. The Minister is aware of the case that I shall describe at this late hour, and the time available compels me to do so in shorthand. It concerns a woman of 95, Mrs. Agnes Scott, formerly resident in Parthhead, Midlothian, but now resident in a nursing home. She is severely disabled and confined to a wheelchair. The medical evidence describes her as frail, suffering from dementia and osteoarthritis, and says that she requires full-time nursing care. I hope that the Minister will at least have the grace to agree with those medical facts.

I must pay the highest compliment to Mrs. Agnes Scott's grandson, Mr. H. Leonard Scott, who has campaigned for justice for his grandmother. I do so deliberately because he gives the lie to what is abroad nowadays—that children, or grandchildren, show lack of concern for their parents or grandparents. Mr. Scott has been a tower of strength to his mother, who is a pensioner and has been seriously ill. She is worried sick about what will happen to her 95-year-old mother. Lest there be any doubt about the role that she has played in looking after her mother, I want the record to show that for 16 years she cared for her mother until her own health broke down. Only reluctantly, under the pressure of medical advice, did she consent to her mother being cared for in a nursing home. Mrs. Agnes Scott's daughter was in no position to choose any particular establishment for her mother, because she herself had been hospitalised for eight months.

The statutory instrument sets a limit of £170 a week on payments for nursing home fees for the elderly and disabled. I regret to say that I was given deplorable advice by the Minister in a letter. He wrote that charity should be asked to make up the shortfall between the limit and the fees. That was his response when I wrote him about the case of 95-year-old Mrs. Agnes Scott, who has lived in Hilton Lodge nursing home since 1 October 1984. It is suitable for her needs and she is perfectly happy there. If she were removed on the ground of cost, the consequences would be fatal for her. The Minister has had a letter from me to tell him that his charity advice offers no solution to the problem.

In the Minister's letter of 8 April he asserted that Mrs. Scott is in the nursing home that charges the highest fees. My response demonstrates that that is not true. He has been given the figures and I hope that he will concede that the information given in his letter of 8 April is misinformation.

The feature that bedevils Mrs. Agnes Scott's case is that she has a decision in her favour arising from a tribunal decision of 21 February 1986. I shall quote the judgment in its totality because it has a bearing on what I want to say about the regulations. The judgment reads:

"The Tribunal considered Regulation 9 of the Requirement Regulations and Schedule 1(A) and 2f which gives the figure of £138·60 per week ie the prescribed rate. This prescribed rate is now £170 a week as Mrs. Scott was paying £190 a week prior to 29.4.85 This became the protected rate. The majority held the view that it was her tenancy in the suitable nursing home which was protected and this would take into account any reasonable weekly increase, and in this case the weekly increase of £9·50 a week was reasonable in that it was less than the rate of inflation this was what 'protected' meant in the meaning of the Act and word."

To give a fair picture, I should add that the dissenting member held that the tribunal had to take account of what the Act said, not what the tribunal thought that it intended to say. He maintained that the £190 per week was protected, not any subsequent weekly increase, however resonable.

There is no decision in regard to inflation, which reveals the defectiveness of the Act. The adjudication officer has challenged the legality of the tribunal's finding and is appealing to the social security commissioners. The tribunal's decision is frozen, and poor Mrs. Scott and her relatives are left to sweat it out.

Many of my constituents are puzzled. They believe that Parliament makes the laws and that, if a law is defective or in doubt, Parliament hastens to clarify it. If I had more time, I could give examples of defective unfair and unjust legislation that Parliament has remedied. When the statutory instrument was debated in November 1984—it was imposed in April 1985—the Secretary of State for Social Services gave the House the assurance that there was no question of elderly handicapped or disabled people being moved out of their existing accommodation and that their position would be protected.

The Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security, the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney), was asked in a radio interview last July whether the limits were not putting on families the onus of paying for nursing homes. He replied:

"We are definitely not. People are saying that because they are misinformed."

The 95-year-old lady has a daughter who is herself on a pension. She cannot maintain her mother. At great personal sacrifice, she has attempted to buy her mother what can be called the basic necessities.

The statements that I have quoted do not tally with the history of the case. Ministers must be held accountable for what they say. It is a serious matter if they have deceived Parliament. The Minister has some explaining to do, although other Ministers should be at the Dispatch Box to explain.

Real compassion for 95-year-old Mrs. Agnes Scott is alive in my constituency, but there is also anger that the Government do not seem to match it. Her grandson asked me whether his grandmother would be murdered by a parliamentay statutory instrument, because that was what it would mean if she were moved from Hilton Lodge. I could not answer the question. Can the Minister answer it tonight? The answer is anxiously awaited by the Scott family, by many other elderly people throughout Scotland and by Age Concern Scotland which reads our proceedings on behalf of its many elderly citizens.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Major): I must say immediately that compassion does not merely rest in Midlothian or, indeed, on the Opposition Benches, although I appreciate that the hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie) did not suggest that. The welfare of the elderly and the disadvantaged are matters of concern to us all, and I shall seek to deal with the issue.

I am exceedingly familiar with the case from which the hon. Gentleman drew a great deal of his text. He will know that the tribunal judgment is at present the subject of an appeal, and it would be unwise and improper for me to trespass on that matter. I appreciate that the charges relating to other homes are a relatively minor matter, but the hon. Gentleman has slightly incomplete information, and he may find that, for that innocent reason, he has been misled.

The hon. Gentleman will know that it has long been an established practice under both Governments that the details of individual cases of this nature tend not to be discussed on the Floor of the House. However, I am perfectly happy to meet him privately at any time to discuss the matter. He has only to ask for us to have a conversation about the particular details of Mrs. Scott. I make that offer now, as I would have done previously, had he approached me requesting such a meeting at any time in the past.

Mr. Eadie: The Minister should not deceive the House with that offer. I will accept any offer from a Minister to meet and discuss any case. He should be fair to the House and admit that I received an answer to my letter only when I tabled a question asking when I would receive a reply. That does not show any sense of urgency or co-operation on the part of the Minister.

Mr. Major: If the hon. Gentleman wishes to be contentious, I am prepared to meet him. I was endeavouring to make him a realistic, civilised offer because I am not prepared to swap the details of a lady's particular difficulties across the Floor of the House. That would be neither proper nor appropriate and I will not do it, whatever the provocation may be. I am prepared to discuss the matter with the hon. Gentleman, and that was the point that I was making to him.

I must commiserate with the hon. Gentleman about the timing of the debate. As the collective House is aware, although the hon. Gentleman did not mention it this evening, we have been reviewing the supplementary benefit limits for all forms of board and lodging, including those for people in homes and hostels. We shall shortly be announcing the outcome of that review, and obviously, I cannot anticipate it. I must confine my remarks to the present arrangements, although I am acutely aware of the difficulties facing some elderly people, and we have paid special attention to them. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that.

It may be helpful to put the matter in a proper context if I remind the house briefly of the background to the changes we made last year. That was noticably absent from the hon. Gentleman's remarks. Our changes had three aims in respect of both ordinary board and lodgings, to which there was a passing reference, and residential and nursing homes in Lothian and elselwhere.

The first of those aims was to gain control of very rapidly escalating expenditure. I shall return to that point later. The second was to target expenditure more precisely on those in real need, and the third was to help to curb undoubted abuse in some—although, of course, not all —areas. We were also concerned that, with the easy availability of high boarder payments, the benefit system was, in effect, acting as an artificial stimulus to the market, resulting in some cases of exploitation and waste. I emphasise "some", because I am not making a more general charge. It is not a matter of dispute between us that that was a genuine problem—[Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman had a great deal to say earlier. He might do me the courtesy of listening in the time remaining, so that he cannot at some later stage say that I did not respond to his points.

The hon. Gentleman expressed concern about people in homes. That has to be seen in the context of the Government's very good record in recent years. Since the Conservative party took office in 1979 we have enabled many thousands more people to opt for the residential care of their choice, and that is continuing. The hon. Gentleman talked of compassion, but a sharp contrast can be drawn between us and the Labour Government. He did not mention the fact that, under that Government, supplementary benefit was only rarely sufficient to meet the charges incurred by elderly people in homes. I fear that he overlooked that point.

The 1979 supplementary benefits handbook explained just how little could be paid then. Local limits were set by reference to "the highest charge a short-term claimant might be obliged to pay to find full board and lodging in commercial establishments of a reasonable standard".

In other words, the amounts payable were geared to short-term unemployed claimants, not to the needs of the elderly and the disabled. There has been a material change in that respect.

People in need of residential or nursing care had very little choice at that time. Those who could not pay privately had to rely on local authorities to provide accommodation, or they filled the long-stay wards of National Health Service hospitals. The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that in many cases hard-pressed families felt that they had to cope as best they could in difficult circumstances. I am not tonight arguing that the present system is perfect in all respects. Clearly there are difficulties with it. But, with all its difficulties, the present system is infinitely better than that. That point must be made so that people view policy in the round.

The Government changed the benefit rules so as to open up the option of care in the independent sector. That should be remembered, as it is important to many people in this country. The figures speak for themselves. In 1978, 7,000 supplementary benefit claimants were assisted with their fees in residential care and nursing homes. By 1984, the estimated figure was a six-fold increase, to 42,000. Expenditure has gone up even more. In 1978, £6 million was spent in that area; by 1983 expenditure had reached £105 million and by 1984 it was estimated to be £190 million. That was a quite staggering increase, but it was justifiable, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman welcomed it.

It has never been the Government's intention to supplant the valuable role of local or health authorities in this area. Indeed, we are discussing with them how collaboration can be improved. There are grey areas of difficulty between their role and the role of supplementary benefit. I regret, although I understand the point, that a number of authorities took the increases in benefit entitlement as a cue to cease sponsoring claimants in residential care. Nationally, the number of people sponsored by local authorities in private and voluntary homes has been declining although the numbers in homes have tended to increase.

That picture is mirrored in Lothian. In 1980, there were 544 people sponsored in the Lothian area. By 1985, that figure had fallen to 427. I understand that this trend is likely to increase in future. I should reiterate that local authorities still retain their rights and responsibilities in this area—[Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman is always trying to make political points. The situation is precisely the same in many areas in which the Labour party is in control, and he should acknowledge that.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): Give us the figures.

Mr. Major: The hon. Gentleman will get the figures if he tables a question. We are discussing Lothian, and nominally at least, the hon. Gentleman is not, as far as I am aware, part of the debate. If he so wished, he could have indicated in the normal way that he wanted to take part in the debate. From the way in which the hon. Gentleman has intervened, it is becoming apparent that the debate has as much to do with party politics as with anything else.

Mr. Eadie: On a point of Order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I resent the fact that the Minister, in an Adjournment debate granted to an hon. Member, has acted in such an arrogant manner. He has been given 14 minutes out of 30 minutes to reply to the debate. Let us have a little less arrogance.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. That is not a point of order, as the hon. Member knows.

Mr. Major: It certainly was not a point of order. It was one of the most ludicrous interventions that I have heard in my few years as a Member of the House. I assume that the hon. Gentleman would like an answer, although there seems to be some question about that.

Mr. Eadie: The hon. Gentleman had 14 minutes in which to reply.

Mr. Major: It is a jolly sight less, with the interruptions and mutterings from the hon. Member for Midlothian and his Front Bench colleague, the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing). One begins to wonder whether the hon. Gentleman wants a reply.

[Mr. Major]

Although the changes in the supplementary benefit rules since 1980 brought many advantages, the system did not always work fairly. For example, the amount of supplementary benefit for people in residential care homes varied substantially from place to place—from £51 to £215 a week. Nursing home limits, which, admittedly, were more relevant to Mrs. Scott, varied between £80 and £295 a week. Because limits were set locally by adjudication officers by reference to charges actually levied, they were susceptible to manipulation by the more unscrupulous proprietors. Excessive profits were made at the taxpayer's expense, and value for money was not always given. In other circumstances, the hon. Gentleman would have been the first person to criticise that trend, although he has offered precious little support to the Government in trying to curb it.

No responsible Government could ignore such problems, and last year we took steps to deal with them. We replaced the old local limits with a new, more consistent structure of national limits which varied according to the category of home—for elderly people, those who were handicapped, and so on. The limits operated in progressive steps to meet the anticipated cost of providing an appropriate level of care. The new limits were specifically intended to allow reasonable charges to be met in homes satisfying the registration requirements. Last November, we increased those limits by £10 for residential care homes and by a substantial £31·40 for nursing homes. That was another material fact that slipped the hon. Gentleman's mind when he addressed the House earlier.

The limits for residential care homes now range from £120 to £180 a week. While the limits for nursing homes range from £170—as the hon. Gentleman mentioned—to £230 a week. Those new limits were substantially higher than those they superseded in some places and for a large number of people. In other cases, they were lower. The hon. Gentleman expressed concern about the position of people already in homes charging above the current limit when the changes were made. For those people, we provided unprecedentedly extensive transitional arrangements, which were described not by Ministers but by the Social Security Advisory Committee as generous. People over pension age had their existing level of benefit protected until such time as payment under the new rules became more favourable to them.

That was the extent and nature of transitional protection. It was precisely on all fours with the nature of transitional protection at all times since we have had a social security system — whatever party has been in power. There is nothing novel about the way that transitional protection worked. People under pension age were protected for a year until April 1986 to give them time to make alternative arrangements. There was provision to extend the protected period where exceptional hardship would otherwise result.

In keeping with all precedents under Governments of both parties no provision was made to increase the transitionally protected amounts to meet fresh increases in fees. The hon. Gentleman suggested that that was harsh but, as I said a moment ago, it is not my intention to discuss Mrs. Scott's case across the Floor of the House. In the moments left to me, I reiterate, although I wanted to say much more, that I will be happy to meet the hon. Gentleman to discuss the case and the wider application of the board and lodging rules, if he so wishes. That is an open offer to him.

I should like to say that the Government's intention, in their care for the elderly and the disabled, was to make the transitional protection provision as generous and as flexible as possible. I know that Mrs. Scott's grandson felt differently, but people do retain the same level of protection if they move to another home, although no one can receive more than the actual charge that they are required to pay. The logic of the hon. Gentleman's position can only be that any fees that proprietors choose to impose should be met, whatever their level. I am pleased to put it on record that the hon. Member for Falkirk, East shakes his head. [Interruption.] I did not say that the hon. Member for Midlothian said that. That is the logic of what he said. I am pleased to have it on record that it is not the Labour party's policy that any fee increase of any sort should be met. That is an important——

Oral Answers to Questions

NATIONAL FINANCE

Interest Rates

1. Mr. Andy Stewart asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the current level of interest rates.

8. Mr. Ottaway asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what effect his Budget has had upon the level of interest rates.

9. Mr. Hayes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the present level of interest rates.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): Base rates have been reduced by 2 per cent. since the Budget.

Mr. Stewart: I thank my right hon. Friend for that continuing good news about the economy, particularly as it benefits the Exchequer, industry and mortgage payers. However, at what level would interest rates be if the Labour party implemented its £24 billion of expenditure?

Mr. Lawson: If it were to implement the extra £24 billion of public expenditure we would have substantial increases in taxation, possibly a VAT rate of 41 per cent., excessive borrowing, interest rates much higher than they are today, and no doubt before very long we would be in the hands of the IMF.

Mr. Ottaway: Is my right hon. Friend aware that a survey carried out among business men by the Nottinghamshire chamber of commerce showed that what concerned them most was high interest rates? With, I hope, inflation following West Germany down to zero, resulting in high real interest rates, will he please do whatever possible to bring interest rates down as soon as possible to try to alleviate the fears of those Nottinghamshire business men?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right. It is important that interest rates should be brought down as much and as soon as is prudent. The 2 per cent. reduction in interest rates already since the Budget has been accompanied by a reduction in the mortgage interest rate of 1¾ per cent., which will come into effect on 1 June, which, on its own, is worth some £3·60 a week to the man or family with the average outstanding mortgage.

Mr. Hayes: Now that Cabinet government has been restored, that we have a balanced ticket and that the winds of change are sweeping through the Treasury, will my right hon. Friend accept that any relaxation of the rules governing the spending of capital receipts by local authorities from council house sales would not significantly affect interest rates?

Mr. Lawson: No, my hon. Friend is wrong. That could have an effect on interest rates. However, I am glad to see from the earlier part of his question that he appears to be fully content with the present state of affairs.

Mr. Penhaligon: When, within the strategy currently being pursued, does the Chancellor expect British interest rates to be as much below the international average as they are currently above it?

Mr. Lawson: The hon. Gentleman is right in saying that our level of interest rates is higher than the general level in major countries overseas. The relationship between interest rates in Britain and overseas is not unconnected with the fact that labour costs per unit of output are rising much faster in Britain than in our major competitors. That is the major weakness in the British economy at present, and it is a job for management to take a better grip of its costs. We shall then be able to see benefits in competitiveness and in interest rates as well.

Mr. Evans: If interest rates are falling so well and everything in the garden is so wonderful, why does unemployment continue to increase? I cite the announcement this week that 1,000 jobs will be lost at Kodak, that another 1,000 jobs will go at British Caledonian, and, as we heard yesterday, the appalling loss of 3,500 redundancies in the shipbuilding industry.

Mr. Lawson: The hon. Gentleman should have listened a little more attentively to my answer to the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) a moment ago. Unemployment is all part of the same problem. Labour costs per unit of output are increasing far too quickly in this country, which prices workers in many of our industries out of jobs, as we are not as competitive as our rivals overseas.

Mr. Latham: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the welcome reduction in interest and mortgage rates will at least do something to offset the deplorable increase in domestic and commercial rates imposed by Labour and Liberal councils, including in our county of Leicester?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right about the county of Leicester, which both he and I represent. There is considerable unrest about the level of rates imposed by the Labour-controlled council. The same problem exists in much of the country. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks about the considerable benefits to the economy as a result of the Budget and the consequent reduction in interest rates.

Dr. McDonald: By exactly how much will bank interest rates in Britain have to be cut if they are to fall to the same level as real interest rates in America, Japan, France and Germany, our main competitors?

Mr. Lawson: Although it is difficult to measure precisely or accurately real interest rates, they are slightly higher in this country than in most other major countries. A Labour Government might considerably reduce real interest rates in the same way as always—by letting inflation go through the roof.

Freeports

2. Mr. Colvin asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects to receive a report from the appointed consultants about reviewing the customs and tax regulations covering freeports; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Peter Brooke): The consultants were appointed in July 1984 to undertake a five-year research study to enable an initial evaluation of the freeport experiment. Annual progress reports submitted by the consultants to date include assessments of the problems which have arisen in the operation of freeports.

Mr. Colvin: That is a long time to have to wait. Is my hon. Friend aware that the experiment is unlikely to prove successful unless he does something to get the Customs and Excise off the backs of the freeports? Some of us believe that the Customs and Excise was determined to ensure that the experiment failed before it even started. The freeports need to be wholly free of VAT. In some instances, the VAT regime inside the freeport is even worse than that outside it, which is hardly a recipe for success.

Mr. Brooke: I must rebut my hon. Friend's contention about the Customs and Excise. It has not changed any of the rules that were set out at the beginning of the freeports experiment. Freeports remain subject to European Community legislation. On the subject of consultants, there will shortly be an interim report.

Unemployment (Budget Effects)

3. Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the effect of the Budget on unemployment; and if he will make a statement.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John MacGregor): While it is impossible to isolate the direct effect of the Budget, or indeed of any Budget, on unemployment, the hon. Gentleman will welcome the fact that nearly 1 million additional new jobs have been created since the last election.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: Is it not a disgrace that with more than 4 million people unemployed so little attention was given to job creation in the Budget statement? Does that now show the Government's callous and uncaring nature? I can point to hundreds of people in my constituency and on Merseyside who have lost their jobs since the Budget statement. How many people can the Minister point to who have found jobs?

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that the figures is not——

Mr. Kilroy-Silk: How many?

Mr. MacGregor: I shall answer the hon. Gentleman's questions. The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that the figure is not 4 million. The figure could amount to that only if he included the people in employment through various job creation measures. The Budget added considerably to the already very high total of expenditure being incurred on job creation, employment and training measures. When we took office the figure was under £400 million. By the end of these three years it will be £3 billion, which is a clear indication of the priority that we give this subject.

Mr. Forman: Is not the level of unemployment, both now and in the future, affected at least as much by unit labour costs, as was pointed out by our right hon. Friend earlier? Therefore, would it not be sensible to press ahead as rapidly as possible with schemes to make pay more profit-related, since that might help to redress some of the problem?

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend is entirely right to draw attention again to the problem of unit labour costs, where the position is, if anything, deteriorating. I hope that employers and employees will take into account that very important part of job creation — the Budget measures which reduced income tax for employees, which in many cases considerably increases their take-home pay.

My hon. Friend knows that we are engaging in discussions on profit sharing. I hope that that, too, will help to reduce unit labour costs.

Mr. Wigley: Does the Minister recall that it was to encourage entrepreneurs to create jobs that the top rate of income tax was reduced from 84 to 60 per cent.? Will he set up a study to investigate whether a single job has been created by that?

Mr. MacGregor: It is clear that the whole series of tax measures, not just the one referred to by the hon. Gentleman, designed to encourage job creation and small business development have worked. The number of new businesses starting up and expanding has been very creditable under this Government compared with the record in the past, and is a major contributor to jobs.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Will my right hon. Friend take up with employer organisations his disappointment over the fact that many firms prefer to increase the wages of existing employees by more than the rate of inflation, rather than take on additional staff? Does he agree that, by international standards, our performance in that respect is poor and is making unemployment worse?

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend is putting the unit labour cost argument in another way. I agree with him that this practice does not help unemployment. It is important that all employers take note of the arguments. I pay tribute to the work of the CBI, which is tryng to get across that message, as we do in everything that we say.

Mr. Mason: Will the Minister answer the simple question embodied in the original question? What figure can he give for a reduction in the dole queues as a result of the last Budget?

Mr. MacGregor: The last Budget was not very long ago — [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] The right hon. Gentleman must recognise that there have been increases in net new jobs in this country on a scale greater than in the remainder of western Europe put together as a result of the last three Budgets and the policies that we have been pursuing.

Mr. Nicholls: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the effect on employment cannot be considered in isolation from the basis on which the unemployment figures are calculated? For example, the severely disabled and single-parent families can be included in unemployment figures, as can people over 60, who sign on simply to obtain their national insurance tax credits. Figures that include such people cannot be treated as an accurate reflection of unemployment.

Mr. MacGregor: It is clear that some people are included in the unemployment figures—and there have been various calculations of the number—who are not actively seeking work.

Mr. Terry Davis: Will the Chief Secretary confirm that his figure of 1 million new jobs since 1983 includes about 250,000 second jobs—second jobs obtained by people who already have jobs; second jobs that are often part-time jobs? Is it not true that there are still 1 million fewer people in employment today than there were in 1979, even allowing for everything that has happened since 1983?

As the Minister has referred to the rest of Europe, will he confirm that, under this Government, Britain has not only lost more jobs since 1979 than any other member the Common Market, but has lost more jobs than all the other countries in the Common Market added together?

Mr. MacGregor: There are some people in the figures —we do not know yet how many, but the number will be small and not on the scale suggested—who have two jobs. We shall eventually discover the number when the surveys have been completed. That does not diminish the fact that there has been a substantial increase in the number of people—the figure is close to the number of net new jobs—who are new to the work force. I do not know why the hon. Gentleman keeps criticising the Government for the number of new jobs that are part-time jobs. Part-time jobs will always have a major contribution to make to the economy. It is interesting to observe that part-time jobs contributed to more than half the increase in the number of jobs under the previous Labour Government.

Personal Equity Plans

4. Mr. Freeman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received on the proposed establishment of personal equity plans.

Mr. Lawson: A considerable number, most of which have warmly welcomed the proposal.

Mr. Freeman: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that since 1979, when the Government came into power, the proportion of the population owning shares has doubled from 7 to 14 per cent.? Will he accept that this has been a substantial achievement? As we are now to have personal equity plans, does my right hon. Friend agree that it would be reasonable to aim for 20 per cent. of the population to own shares, which is close to the percentage in the United States?

Mr. Lawson: Yes. The most recent survey conducted by National Opinion Poll showed that the proportion of adults directly owning shares has doubled since 1979 along the lines that my hon. Friend suggested. This has arisen largely as a result of two factors. First, there has been a sharp growth in employee share schemes. Secondly, there has been the Government's privatisation programme, especially British Telecom. We are now adding a third leg to what will become a tripod with the introduction of personal equity plans, which, as I said in my earlier answers, have had a warm welcome throughout the community.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Does the Chancellor accept that personal equity plans would be even more widely and enthusiastically accepted and welcomed if they gave greater incentives than are at present planned? Does he accept also that the great prize for British industry would be to have an agreement which extended across the political parties on this scheme and on the right hon. Gentleman's profit-sharing scheme, which we very much welcome, which he introduced at the NEDC on Monday? Will he incorporate in the discussions on these matters not only both sides of industry but the other parties?

Mr. Lawson: I shall always be happy to listen to representations from the hon. Gentleman and from anyone else before the scheme finally comes into full operation on 1 January 1987. I am glad to know that the hon. Gentleman welcomes the tax concessions under the personal equity plan of complete freedom from income tax on dividends and of capital gains tax on disposals, proposals which were never put into play under the previous Labour Government, of whom the hon. Gentleman was such an avid supporter.

Mr. Skinner: Does the Chancellor of the Exchequer recall that after the findings of the National Opinion Poll were published it was suggested by many, and reported, that the increase in share owners from 7 to 14 per cent. arose because there had been a lot of double counting? Will he confirm that the greatest increase of share ownership that has taken place pro rata is in the Government and the Cabinet itself, with nine members of the Cabinet owning shares and with the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Transport leading the way by making money out of the coal strike and privatisation, only to be superseded by the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Wrigglesworth), who represents Barclays Bank in this place?

Mr. Lawson: I regret that I was not able to hear much of what the hon. Gentleman said. Modern Cabinets may be rather large, but to suggest that they account for 14 per cent. of the adult population of Great Britain is going a little far.

Mr. Tim Smith: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the refinements to the scheme, which were announced by the Treasury this week to include unit trusts, are very welcome? Who is to issue the plans if the Financial Services Bill does not become law by 1 January of next year, which seems likely?

Mr. Lawson: It is important that the Financial Services Bill should become law by 1 January next year, as I am sure my hon. Friend agrees. If that were not so, special arrangements would have to be in force for the interim period.

Gold Reserves

5. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the value of the United Kingdom's gold reserves.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): $6·1 billion.

Mr. Brown: As there seem to be some goodies in the kitty, despite the recession, would this be an opportune time to return Albania's gold to its rightful owners—the Albanian Government? Must we not face that issue?

Mr. Stewart: I should explain to the hon. Gentleman that the figure for which he asked and the answer which I gave related to the United Kingdom's gold reserves. His question on Albania relates to gold that is held on behalf of the Tripartite Commission for the Restitution of Monetary Gold, in which the United States, the United Kingdom and France are joint participants.

Mr. John Browne: Does my hon. Friend accept that the question of gold reserves has been brought into stark focus by the enormous increase in the number of financial instruments and the financial pyramiding involved, and by the vast increase in trading volume throughout the world? The question arises as to the implications for the financial community of any failure of settlement. Is it not prudent for the Government to increase their gold reserves at such a time?

Mr. Stewart: Total reserves have been increasing. In fact, in the past few months there has been a rise on every occasion. We judge the present balance between gold and convertible currency to be about right in present circumstances.

Public Expenditure

6. Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest projection for public expenditure as a proportion of gross domestic product in 1986-87.

Mr. MacGregor: The latest estimate of general Government expenditure as a percentage of gross domestic product for 1986-87 is 42½ per cent.

Mr. Howarth: Does my right hon. Friend agree that we are by no means achieving full value for our existing public expenditure on health and education? Although it is far from certain that a more relaxed approach to public expenditure would produce better public services, we know all too well from experience that it would lead to higher taxes, higher interest rates and higher unemployment. Will my right hon. Friend underline that truth to the alliance parties, which want to spend an extra £10 billion, and to the Liberal party in Warwickshire, which proposed a rate increase of 23·3 per cent. and more? I am happy to say that those Liberals failed to impress the electorate.

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend was correct in the first part of his question. That is why, in addition to establishing priorities in public expenditure, we are concentrating so much on getting value for money in all the programmes. I am sure my hon. Friend will be pleased to know that, as a result of efforts in obtaining value for money in the Health Service, about £150 million a year extra has been devoted to real front-line care. We must continue with such an approach. My hon. Friend was entirely right in the second part of his question. As we saw under the last Labour Government, those were precisely the consequences, and they would be repeated under the proposals put forward by the Liberals and the SDP.

Mr. Madden: How much is it costing the Government to sustain record unemployment?

Mr. MacGregor: The figures for unemployment benefit are in the public expenditure White Paper. If there is ever-increasing public expenditure, it has to be paid for in other ways, which loses real, permanent jobs elsewhere.

European Monetary System

7. Mr. Knox asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next proposes to have discussions with the European Community Council of Ministers about the European monetary system.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Aspects of the European monetary system come up for discussion from time to time.

Mr. Knox: Can my hon. Friend think of more suitable circumstances than those that obtain at present for Britain to join the exchange rate mechanism of the EMS? If not, why do we not join?

Mr. Stewart: We have always made it clear that we see both advantages and disadvantages in membership of the exchange rate mechanism of the EMS. We keep it under review. We would need to be satisfied that there was a clear balance of advantage before joining.

Mr. Meadowcroft: What is the right basis on which we should join the EMS?

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Gentleman makes a fundamental mistake in assuming that membership of the ERM is determined solely on the basis of prevailing rates of exchange between sterling and other currencies. A range of other matters, such as volatility and the technical arrangements of the mechanism itself, must be taken into account.

Mr. Budgen: When my hon. Friend has an opportunity to speak to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, will he tell him that it would be a good thing if he told his many friends among the fashionable economic commentators that the Prime Minister's opposition in principle to joining the EMS is neither eccentric nor isolated, and that many hon. Members on both sides of the House would deeply resent the loss of national sovereignty that would occur if we were to join?

Mr. Stewart: I note what my hon. Friend has said and, if I get an opportunity to see my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, I shall pass on his remarks. My hon. Friend's question and the question raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox) illustrate the fact that people can hold different opinions on this matter.

Mr. Evans: When the Minister next meets his European colleagues to discuss European matters, especially the ecu, will he inform them of the Chancellor's new-found enthusiasm for profit-sharing by employees as part of their wages? Will the hon. Gentleman inform his European colleagues that the Government are prepared to accept the modest Vredeling proposals on employees having the right to information about their companies?

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Gentleman's question is rather far from the question of the European monetary system. However, I am glad that he has some words of approval for my right hon. Friend's profit-sharing proposals.

Mr. Dorrell: If, as my hon. Friend said, there are advantages and disadvantages in joining the EMS, what is the critical disadvantage that keeps us out of it, and therefore keeps our currency fluctuating, in preference to a sound, stable currency at a fixed rate against the currencies of our major European partners?

Mr. Stewart: Two or three months ago I went into these questions at some length in a debate in the House, and I shall gladly do so again outside the Chamber with my hon. Friend. Clearly, in considering the EMS, we must recognise that joining would not be an easy option. My hon. Friend's point about the movement of the exchange rate between sterling and the continental currencies is only part of the picture. It is a mechanism, and a number of its aspects must be taken into account.

Income Tax

10. Mr. Sackville asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the proportion of income tax revenue paid by the 10 per cent. of taxpayers with the highest incomes; and what was the comparable proportion in 1979-80.

Mr. MacGregor: The proportion is 37½ per cent. in 1986-87, compared with 34 per cent. in 1979-80.

Mr. Sackville: Is that proportion not further evidence that the sky-high tax rates of the last Government were counter-productive and that our reductions in those rates produced a greater, not a smaller, tax yield, to the benefit not only of high rate taxpayers but taxpayers in general?

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend is right. It demonstrates what we have always said — that lower taxes provide encouragement and motivation leading to greater earnings and hence to greater achievement. As my hon. Friend has implied, that is in sharp contrast to the Labour party's policies. It is fairly clear that at the moment the Labour party simply cannot add up the figures. Recently, the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) made a speech in which he said that people earning more than £30,000 a year would have to pay more tax. Just to get anywhere near the yield that the right hon. Gentleman seeks would mean total confiscation of earning over £30,000 a year. It is hard to say how that encourages motivation or provides greater tax yields.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is it not true that, once again, the right hon. Gentleman misrepresents the figures? [Interruption.] He knows that a Labour Government would increase—[Interruption.] Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Mr. Campbell-Savours.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The Minister knows that the next Labour Government will increase capital gains tax and capital transfer tax, and by raising those revenues, in addition to the revenues raised from those who are paid higher levels of salary, we will fund Labour's programme.

Mr. MacGregor: Because of the——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Just stick to the facts.

Mr. MacGregor: Because of the growth in the economy and growth in capital values, the yield from capital taxes has also gone up under this Government. I will stick to the facts. The facts are that the yield from the capital taxes, which the Labour party says it will increase, will fall far short of financing the programme put forward by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) and his party. An additional £1·9 billion would be required—I am giving the facts—and even if, as the right hon. Gentleman said, people earning more than £30,000 had to pay more tax, with the implication that others would not, and even if they all were prepared to go on earning at their present rate, with total confiscation of all earnings above £30,000, it would yield only £1½ billion. Those are the facts, and they show that the policy is nonsense.

Mr. Fallon: Does my right hon. Friend agree that his target of 25 per cent. income tax may just be a marker to some people, but means a great deal more to millions of low-paid workers? If he cannot convince his colleagues that consolidation is no policy for the poorly paid and disadvantaged, how can we persuade the public?

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend is right. The purpose of the tax changes in the Budget and of the long-term target of 25 per cent. is meant to be of great benefit and is mainly directed to those on modest incomes.

Mr. Penhaligon: Is not another interpretation the possibility that those job-destroying pay rises, to which the Chancellor referred, have gone to those who are already the highest paid?

Mr. MacGregor: No. If unit labour costs as a whole are going up, that cannot mean that they are confined to only a small band of income earners. The truth is that it is happening across the whole field. That is why the tax changes we have introduced in the Budget will, I hope, help to prevent those rises taking place.

Inflation

11. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the current level of inflation.

Mr. Lawson: Over the 12 months to March 1986 the retail prices index increased by 4·2 per cent. and I expect tomorrow's figure to be substantially better.

Mr. MacKay: Does my right hon. Friend agree that these exciting prospects could be put in jeopardy if employers in the private sector were to continue to concede irresponsible and inflationary wage settlements, with their consequent effect on unit labour costs, the efficiency of British industry and job prospects?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right to talk about the dangers of excessive increases in unit labour costs. However, the consequences will be felt not so much on inflation as on employment and jobs. That is the problem at present. Another and much greater threat to inflation would be if, by any mischance, any of the Opposition parties were to gain office.

Mr. Ashton: When the Chancellor set out on his policy to reduce inflation to this level, did he know that it would create unemployment of nearly 4 million?

Mr. Lawson: It is not inflation that has created unemployment. In fact, the reverse is the case. Rising inflation is bad for jobs. The inflation record of this Government is something of which the whole nation can be proud.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that inflation is not a disease, the cure for which is to forget about it, but a constant pressure in the economy which requires the consistent approaches which we have had until now and which we need in the future?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right. The achievement of the Government in getting inflation down as far as we have—it is going down still further—is something which nobody in this country should take for granted.

Mr. Winnick: Is it not interesting that despite all the boasting by the Chancellor about inflation rates, the electorate, at every opportunity since the Budget, have decisively rejected policies which they know mean continuing mass unemployment and cuts in housing, education and the Health Service? Is it not also interesting to note that not only are the public not convinced, but that Cabinet colleagues of the Chancellor are not convinced, such as the Leader of the House, who, in a television interview on Sunday, made it perfectly clear that there must be alternative policies to those pursued by the Prime Minister and the Chancellor?

Mr. Lawson: The Cabinet is united on the importance of getting inflation down, and keeping it down. There is no benefit to this country in inflation going up. Let me say, too, that low inflation is of the greatest importance to those who are seeking jobs.

Confectionery (Value Added Tax)

12. Mr. Gregory asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what value added tax revenue he expects to raise through United Kingdom confectionery sales in the current financial year.

Mr. Brooke: It is estimated that the revenue yield from sales in the United Kingdom of chocolates, sweets and similar confectionary will be about £375 million in 1986-87.

Mr. Gregory: Ever since confectionery in this country has been subject to purchase tax, and subsequently to VAT at the standard rate, there has been a major shift in people's dietary habits. Three cooked meals a day are no longer the norm. Confectionery is part of the daily habit. How much longer can the Chancellor justify taxing confectionery, as it is part of the normal consumption of United Kingdom nationals?

Mr. Brooke: I know my hon. Friend's constituency interest in this matter. I applaud his support for the great confectionery manufacturers there, but I cannot hold out hope that the present VAT treatment of confectionery will change. I remind the House that it was the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), in his first Budget in 1974, who standard-rated chocolate.

Sir Kenneth Lewis: Is my hon. Friend aware that I hope very much that he will not increase tax on confectionery in the way in which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor treated the tax on tobacco in the Budget, increasing it by more than the rate of inflation? As a result of that increase there will be a reduction not only in tax receipts from tobacco, but in jobs, as has happened in Northern Ireland, where 900 jobs have been lost. Will my hon. Friend please stop listening to the exaggerated lobby on tobacco smoking, because that is what it is?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is about confectionery.

Mr. Brooke: As you say, Mr. Speaker, the question is about confectionery, but the tobacco yield remains buoyant.

Depositary Receipts

13. Mr. Weetch asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received about his recent statement on American depositary receipts.

Mr. Ian Stewart: We have received a number of letters, generally welcoming the changes.

Mr. Weetch: Is not the Treasury's recent announcement of a reduction in the tax on conversion of depositary receipts from 5 to 1½ per cent. a straight post-Budget tax handout to the City of London? When the Chancellor framed his Budget fixing the rate at 5 per cent., was that not a quid pro quo for tax forgone for a lower rate of stamp duty? What has happened to the Chancellor's calculations now? Is this not yet a further example of a Chancellor fixing policies, and well-placed strategic groups in the City of London weakening his resolve and ultimately destroying it?

Mr. Stewart: No. It is not any of those things. In the light of representations that we received following the Budget, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor was satisfied that our objectives would be achieved in relation to preserving the revenue from stamp duty with a rate of 1½ per cent. instead of 5 per cent. Under those circumstances, it was a perfectly proper change to make.

Sir William Clark: Does my hon. Friend agree that depositary receipts are an admirable way of funding, particularly expansion overseas, and that that applies not only to American but to European depositary receipts? In view of the fact that our American colleagues are against the tax, does my hon. Friend think that that will jeopardise the negotiations that are now going on for the abolition of the unitary tax system?

Mr. Stewart: I am sure that there is no direct connection between those two matters. If British companies wish to raise funds abroad, I have no reason to think that there will not be a satisfactory and active market in ADRs at the rate of 1½ per cent., since they were growing very rapidly indeed in the months before the Budget at the rate of 1 per cent.

Mr. Blair: Does the Economic Secretary to the Treasury recall that his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer sold this proposal to cut stamp duty and give away £70 million on the basis of this special rate of 5 per cent.? How does he intend to make up the revenue? Why is it that whenever the pensioners knock on the Government's door the Government are hard with them, as they are hard with the sick, the unemployed and the disabled, but are always soft with the City?

Mr. Stewart: If I had time, Mr. Speaker, and if I were in order, I should like to explain at length the many things that this Government have done to help the disabled. When my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer made his announcement, subsequent to the Budget, about stamp duty changes, he pointed out that they would be revenue-neutral and that therefore there would be no loss of revenue to the Exchequer.

PRIME MINISTER

Q1. Mr. Sheerman asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 15 May.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Sheerman: Given the further relentless rise in the unemployment figures that have been announced today and the depressing long-term trend, together with the announcement yesterday of the loss of 3,500 jobs in the British shipbuilding industry and the announcement today of the loss of 1,000 jobs at British Caledonian, will the Prime Minister now announce that she will reverse the disastrous economic polices that she has pursued for the last seven years, or that she will call a general election so that Labour can create genuine jobs?

The Prime Minister: No, Sir. I did not notice that Labour did particularly well during the last two by-elections. I am sure the hon. Gentleman noticed that the labour force survey confirmed the overall increase in the number of jobs during the last three years to have been 1 million. I am the first to say that we need more shipbuilding orders, but there are very few of them. However, the hon. Gentleman heard yesterday that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is to take a number of measures to help unemployment in those regions. An enterprise company is to be set up through British Shipbuilders.

Sir Edward du Cann: Has my right hon. Friend noted the deep anxiety with which, on both sides of the House, the announcement about the decline in Britain's shipbuilding capacity was greeted yesterday? Will she re-examine the many constructive proposals that have been put forward for the development of policies to encourage the expansion of the British merchant fleet—national, European and international—upon which the health of all the marine industries depends? May I beg her to bear in mind that the decline in the British merchant fleet and in our shipbuilding capacity is the most serious matter from the point of view of both the economy and defence? It could be changed and it should be changed.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend will be the first to know that the future of British Shipbuilders depends upon success in winning new orders. We are taking a number of measures, particularly with regard to soft credit, to ensure that we can compete on an equal basis with other people. My right hon. Friend will be aware of the tremendous number of surplus ships in the world, amounting to 40 million tonnes, whereas the world capacity is 18 million tonnes. Therefore, the surplus would replace the world capacity.

Mr. Kinnock: Unemployment stands at 3·3 million. Today's figures show the biggest loss in manufacturing jobs in recent years. In the light of that, and in the light of the case that has just been made, not for the first time, by the right hon. Member for Taunton (Sir E. du Cann), will the Prime Minister now adopt a policy for British shipbuilding of scrap and build, and bring forward public sector orders in order to sustain work and skills in the yards, especially in those areas of very high unemployment? Alternatively, does the Prime Minister intend to stand aside and let British Shipbuilders join the long and growing list of those industries that have become her economic victims?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman will be aware that there are very few shipbuilding orders about in the world and that many other shipbuilding countries have had to close their shipyards. The Swedes have effectively abandoned merchant shipbuilding, the Dutch Government have refused to support their industry to build the sister ship to the large North sea ferry—won by Govan — the Japanese are having to adjust to the shortage of orders, the Germans have cut their capacity by half and the French are also cutting capacity. The fact is that there have been so many subsidies for building ships that they have been built and there is surplus tonnage to the tune of 40 million tonnes. There is no point in scrap and build, as there are already too many ships.

Mr. Kinnock: In Japan the unemployment rate is 2·6 per cent., in Sweden it is 2·8 per cent. and in every country which the right hon. Lady has mentioned the unemployment rate is lower than that of Britain, which is nearly 14 per cent. and much lower than the level of nearly 18 per cent. in the northern region of Britain. Different circumstances require different responses. Why will the Prime Minister not look at the option of scrap and build and the option of bringing forward public sector orders for shipbuilding, so as to sustain, for this maritime nation, a viable merchant shipbuilding industry?

The Prime Minister: There are still merchant shipbuilding yards, which I hope will continue. We are trying our level best to get more orders, in particular for Sunderland. With regard to what the right hon. Gentleman has said about full employment in those countries, may I point out that those countries have not attempted to shore up older industries, but have vigorously embraced the new technologies, and that is what we must do.

Mr. Soames: Will my right hon. Friend join me in regretting today's announcement by British Caledonian of nearly 1,000 redundancies, many of whom are my constituents [Interruption]——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is an important question concerning a Member's constituency.

Mr. Soames: In the light of this sad news, will my right hon. Friend have a word with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport and ask him to overturn his appalling decision to revoke the licence for the air link between Gatwick and Heathrow?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend has heard what my hon. Friend has said. I regret that British Caledonian found it necessary to make cuts as a response to lower levels of traffic. Much of the reason for falling traffic has been over-exaggerated fears of terrorism, especially in the United States of America. We are doing everything possible to make them realise that this country has a safer capital than almost any other one in Europe.

Mr. James Callaghan: The fact that the Prime Minister quotes countries like Sweden and Germany shows that the Government do not yet understand that there is a strategic necessity to maintain a maritime presence in this country. If she is looking for orders, why not bring forward the naval programme, especially for the large number of coastal vessels, oil rig protection vessels, guard ships and others that are required by the Royal Navy to overcome this cyclical deficiency? If the Prime Minister does not do so, nobody will believe that the Government are making the maximum efforts to preserve this strategic industry.

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is aware that there is still merchant shipbuilding capacity in this country. He is also aware, as I have said, that the surplus tonnage of ships is already of the order of 40 million tonnes. There is little point in building more when we have that surplus.

With regard to naval ships, the right hon. Gentleman will also be aware that we have brought forward one of the AOR fleet to help Swan Hunter, and that last year we ordered four major and three smaller warships. That is for the warship yards, which, as the right hon. Gentleman knows, are quite different from the merchant shipbuilding yards.

Q2. Mr. Portillo asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 15 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Portillo: If my right hon. Friend turns her attention today to the reallocation of resources in the Health Service to help the worst-off areas, will she reflect on the fact that that policy was originally sponsored by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), who is now the leader of the SDP, that it has been supported by both parties when in office and that, even so, in London, under that policy, 70,000 more patients are now being treated than were treated when the Government came to office?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is absolutely correct. The policy of reallocating health resources away from London because the population of London was falling and to try to equalise health provision throughout the country was started by the Labour Government and has been continued by this Government. Nevertheless, the number of patients being treated in London has still increased—70,000 more in-patients, 70,000 more day cases and 50,000 more out-patients are treated each year. London continues to have about 20 per cent. of expenditure on the hospital services, for about 15 per cent. of the population, so it is still improving its services.

Dr. Owen: When the falling competitiveness of British industry can be desribed as appalling and alarming today by the Prime Minister's own Employment Secretary, does it not show the completely broken-backed nature of the Government's industrial strategy and that unemployment will continue to rise until there is an income strategy which affects the private and the public sectors?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman had a strict income strategy the last time he was in government as a Labour Minister. He also had a strict prices strategy to keep prices down. Inflation is now much lower than it ever was then. The strategy collapsed in the winter of discontent. The right hon. Gentleman would be very rash even to consider bringing it back.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating Leicester city Conservatives and their leader, Councillor Michael Johnson, on gaining two council seats from Labour and a 7·5 per cent. swing to the Conservatives in Leicester, East? Is she aware that it was done by hard work, far too high rates—an 80 per cent. increase — Nelson Mandela park and a twinning arrangement with Nicaragua?

The Prime Minister: I gladly congratulate my hon. Friend on the excellent results that he achieved in the local government elections.

Q3. Dr. M. S. Miller asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 15 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Dr. Miller: Does the Prime Minister intend totally to ignore the lambasting that she has received from the Office of Health Economics, which shows that the United Kingdom is among the lowest spenders on health of all the developed countries of western Europe? Does she still maintain that the Health Service is safe in her hands? That claim runs entirely counter to the experience of doctors, nurses, Health Service workers and patients. When will she fund the Health Service to cater for the legitimate needs of the population, taking account of the fact that people are living longer and that we live in a technological age?

The Prime Minister: If the hon. Gentleman considers the figures carefully, he will see that the proportion of public funds spent is not different. The difference occurs because, in many of those countries, people choose to spend far more of their own money on health, on top of state provision. Some of the countries with the top figures spend enormous sums on health privately. Far more is spent on health in Britain than a few years ago. Far more patients are treated — [Interruption.] Of course Opposition Members do not like it, but they will hear it. Far more patients are being treated, which is what matters. Patient services have increased, waiting lists have fallen and the number of staff in the NHS who deal directly with patients has increased—nurses and midwives by 60,000 and doctors and dentists by 10,000. I am grateful for the opportunity to give those excellent figures.

Q5. Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 15 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Callaghan: Is the Prime Minister aware that, despite her declared intention to create a property-owning community, a recent report by the Association of Metropolitan Authorities has produced some disturbing and alarming figures on mortgage arrears? Is she aware that one in 10 families are declared homeless because they cannot pay their mortgages? Is she aware that the number of those in great financial difficulties with their mortgage repayments has increased by 40 per cent. in the past six months? In view of those disturbing figures, what will she do about the problem?

The Prime Minister: The number of mortgage defaults is extremely small compared with the enormous number of people who take out fresh mortgages every year and the great success of the Government in increasing the number of owner-occupiers. Last year more than 1 million new mortgages were given and 1·3 million new homes were built. Home ownership is up to 62 per cent. from 56 per cent. in 1979.

Q6. Mr. Wilson asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 15 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Wilson: Does the Prime Minister realise that following last week's huge fallout of radioactivity in Scotland, which was the heaviest in the United Kingdom, there is a tremendous revulsion against nuclear power? Does she know that the Torness AGR reactor is at present being fuelled up to go into commission, but is not yet in action? As there is 80 per cent. surplus capacity in nuclear generating in Scotland, will she take account of those feelings in Scotland on the issue of nuclear power and instruct forthwith that Torness be not commissioned?

The Prime Minister: No. Many people were pleased to have the Torness reactor built in Scotland, and many people in Scotland have great faith, as we have, in nuclear power as a way of generating electricity. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will have great faith in our most excellent Nuclear Inspectorate, which does a tremendous job. [Interruption.] I see that he says no. That is what he thinks about the Nuclear Inspectorate, but I am sure that that view is not shared by the rest of the House, nor by the majority of people in Scotland.

Mr. Hayes: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) made a serious point to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister about many of his constituents who are being made unemployed today. You may recall that several Opposition Members responded by cheering and laughter — [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order.

Mr. Hoyle: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I ask you for a ruling to correct an inaccurate statement made yesterday. At Question Time I asked the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry whether his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had met Mr. Robert Stempel of General Motors in New York on 4 May. In reply the Minister said that his right hon. Friend had not met him. The Minister mislead the House with that reply, because he did not say that he had had that meeting. Today I tried to table a question so that the Minister could come to the House and correct that misleading statement, but the Table Office would not allow me to do so. I ask that you allow me to table that question.

Mr. Speaker: I shall look into the matter. As I understand it, the hon. Gentleman asked the Table Office and was told that there was a question on the Order Paper today and that he should wait until the answer was available before tabling his question.

Mr. Bell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. While not in any way challenging your ruling on the first point of order in relation to unemployment in Crawley, may I ask whether it can also be said that it was an incorrect statement of fact? There was no cheering by the Opposition at unemployment in Crawley, just as there is no cheering by Conservative Members at unemployment in Middlesbrough.

Mr. Speaker: Cheering at Prime Minister's questions is legitimate, and today it was somewhat louder than it normally is. We have robust debates in this place, but it is incumbent on the House to give a fair hearing to whoever is on his or her feet.

British Shipbuilders (Statement)

Mr. Bob Clay (Sunderland, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I refer you to column 716 of yesterday's Official Report, Mr. Speaker, and the reply that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry made to my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) on the British Shipbuilders statement. My hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough said:

"He has mentioned Cuba and China, but he has not said whether, if those orders transpire, the yards that he has mentioned today for closure will stay open. Will he now give the House the commitment that, if those orders transpire between now and the end of the year those yards, including Smith's Dock, will stay open?"

The Secretary of State replied:

"If an adequate number of orders can be found to keep those yards open, that will be highly desirable and something that I would welcome."—[Official Report, 14 May 1986; Vol.97, c. 716.]

He went on to say that he thought that it was highly unlikely. However, he clearly indicated that, if orders were available at a sufficient level, the decision on those yards and on redundancies by other yards that are not closing could be reversed——

Mr. Speaker: Order. As far as I can judge from what the hon. Gentleman is saying, these are not matters for me. I think that they should correctly be put to the Leader of the House at business questions. If the hon. Gentleman will contain himself, I will give him that opportunity.

Mr. Clay: Further to that point of order——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not responsible for what Ministers say at the Dispatch Box, nor can I adjudicate upon it. I will give the hon. Gentleman an opportunity to raise that point with the Leader of the House who may well be able to give him the answer that he requires. I cannot.

Mr. Clay: Further to that point of order——

Official Report

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I rise on a point of order relating to the accuracy of the Official Report. I rang your office this morning to draw attention to it, because it apparently is the case that instructions have been given to the Official Reporters that comments made by Members from a sedentary position are not to be reported. Hon. Members on both sides of the House occasionally make such comments, and sometimes the Minister or the Member thus interrupted makes a reference to the interruption which is then deleted.

I am not asking you to give a ruling today, but it is a very important question, Mr. Speaker. The full flavour of the House is contributed to not only by Members on their feet but by Members from a sedentary position. Also, now that the sound archives are available, anyone listening to the sound archives would hear the sedentary comments but would not find them reported in Hansard. I understand that instructions have been given that sedentary interruptions are not to be reported and, indeed, that certain other phrases that have been used in the House are to be deleted.

As you will know, Mr. Speaker, "Erskine May", on page 237, says that you are responsible, through the Clerk of the House, for the accuracy of the Votes and Proceedings, and through the Editor, whom you appoint, for the Official Report of debates, but that the Editor of Hansard is himself responsible for the preparation of an accurate report. I read from "Erskine May" at page 249:

"The Editor is responsible for producing a verbatim report on proceedings in the House . . .for the publication in the Official Report."

The point that I make, Mr. Speaker, is that this affects the integrity of the record. No other Member is allowed to have his phrases removed, and if the Speaker were, through the Clerk, to give instructions, it would affect the integrity of the record. I do not expect that you are able to give a ruling today, but I ask you to consider very carefully either whether this should be referred to the Procedure Committee or alternatively whether, as with the Library and computer bureau, there should be a Committee of the House that overlooks the preparation of Hansard where, hitherto, discretion on whether to report or not to report has been left to the Editor then supervising the preparation of the record.

Mr. Speaker, it is a very big question that I raise. I hope that you will not hasten to reply at once, but I believe that this is a matter that affects the records of Parliament and, indeed, the integrity of its report.

Mr. Speaker: It is an important matter and I am able to reply because the right hon. Gentleman kindly gave me notice that he was going to raise this matter.

May I make it plain to the House that there is nothing new in what I said yesterday. The practices followed in compiling the Official Report are of long standing and are as follows. First, sedentary comments are not reported unless they are taken up either by the Member who has the Floor or by the Chair.

Secondly, if the Chair calls for order or the Member on his feet takes up a group of comments, that is normally reported by the word "interruption". I believe that these practices should be closely observed. I am sure that the House would not wish the occupant of the Chair to rise every few minutes to deal with sedentary interruptions.

Nor do I think that the House would wish a Member to be put on the record when he has not been called by the Chair, either to speak or to intervene in a speech.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Benn: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I fully respect what you have said, but I ask you to consider two things. First of all, as I understand it, the discretion has hitherto been left in implementing the rules to the Official Reporters and the Editor for the day. Secondly, yesterday, it so happens, my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) made an intervention that was the subject of a reply by the Front Bench Minister who was then speaking. I understand that the instructions were that that was to be removed. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that you felt it necessary to give a ruling today, because I urge you to consider the danger of the sound archives recording what actually happened and Hansard recording what the Clerk, on your instructions, told Hansard to report. I beg you to give consideration to this matter, and perhaps allow it to be referred to the Procedure Committee.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Member, and any other Member, can refer such matters to the Procedure Committee—that is not a matter for me. I cannot go beyond what I have said. This is a principle of long standing, and I do not think that the House would wish to have it changed. I rather sensed that from the response that I received.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. You may recall that some of us occasionally make interventions from a sedentary position——

Mr. Alf Dubs (Battersea): Never.

Mr. Faulds: Occasionally. I have now been here a long time—more than most hon. Members—[Interruption.] and there are many more years to come. I recall, and I am sure that you will endorse my argument, Sir, that in those earlier days, frequently sedentary interventions were recorded, whether there was a riposte or not, and they very frequently enlivened the debates, often made valuable points, and were very germane to the debate. I am open to correction, but I understand that you were the one who introduced the change — [Interruption.] Well, your predecessor, among his many other mistakes——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is unworthy of the hon. Gentleman. I have introduced no new principle. I ask the House to consider the implications of every comment from a sedentary position being recorded in Hansard, because after all, what would then be the point of making a speech?

Mr. Faulds: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. If I could finish——

Mr. Benn: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Faulds: If I could finish my point, I should be grateful. I am simply backing the good advice given by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), that perhaps this matter should be considered further, and we should revert to the earlier practice.

Mr. Julian Amery (Brighton, Pavilion): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. Loth as I am to come to the support of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), filial piety obliges me to say that when, in 1939, my father said "Speak for England" in Arthur Greenwood's speech, he did so from a sedentary position, and it is recorded.

Mr. Benn: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The right hon. Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Amery) has cited a famous example of a comment from a sedentary position, which became a historic phrase, quoted around the world. If I may say so, with great respect, Mr. Speaker, I am not asking that that practice should be changed, but that the practice remain unchanged. I was concerned to hear you say that you are sure that the House would not wish to find the record punctuated by such remarks. If sedentary remarks are undesirable, they should be dealt with as they are, by the discipline that is vested in you, Mr. Speaker, not by deleting them from Hansard.

I beg you to take seriously the points that I am making. We are preparing and publishing records for future generations, who will want to get the flavour of the House as well as the words that have been cleared by the Clerks.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest) rose——

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): What did your old man say?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is quite an important matter. I frequently do not hear remarks made from a sedentary position, and I did not hear that one.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: In support of what you have just said, Mr. Speaker, and with reference to what my right hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Amery) said about the famous appeal by his father to a right hon. Member of the Labour party to speak for England, if you will refer to the official record of that day in 1939 you will not find it. Those words went round the world by virtue of the newspaper press, but because they were uttered from a sedentary position they were not reported in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: That is perhaps the fact, but let me clear this matter. I think that the whole House would wish me to do that. Sedentary comments that add to the flavour of the debate are one thing. Constant sedentary comments that are designed to interrupt someone who is on his feet do not add to the debate. That was the point that I was trying to make yesterday and not in any way altering the traditional rules, which I have now affirmed.

Business of the House

3.47 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I ask the Leader of the House to state the business for next week—and the Hansard for 1939?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 19 MAY—Progress on remaining stages of the Social Security Bill (1st Allotted Day).

TUESDAY 20 MAY—Completion of remaining stages of the Social Security Bill (2nd Allotted Day).

There will be a debate to approve the first report from the Privileges Committee 1985-86 (House of Commons Paper No. 376).

WEDNESDAY 21 MAY—Until about seven o'clock, Second Reading of the Legal Aid (Scotland) Bill [Lords] followed by a debate on a motion to take note of the situation in the shipbuilding industry.

Motion relatng to the Town and Country Planning (NIREX) Special Development Order.

THURSDAY 22 MAY—Second Reading of the Sex Discrimination Bill [Lords].

FRIDAY 23 MAY—Debates on the motion for the Adjournment.

Mr. Kinnock: First, may I welcome the fact that Ministers responded to demands made by right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) and myself yesterday and conceded an emergency debate on the crisis in the merchant shipbuilding industry. Even at this late stage, however, I wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman could arrange a different time for the debate next week so that it takes place earlier in the week and, indeed, earlier in the day. There is great interest in the country generally and great anxiety in the shipbuilding areas about this issue and, therefore, great urgency should be attached to the debate.

Today, another rise in unemployment has been recorded, yet the Government still refuse to come to the House to defend their policies, which have brought about this inexorable rise. I have been asking the right hon. Gentleman for some time to arrange such a debate. Semi-detached though he may currently be, I am sure that he has enough of a relationship with the Government to assure us that, in the near future, there could be a debate on unemployment in Government time. I hope that that is the case.

Mr. Gorbachev's views expressed last night add further to the need for a wide-ranging foreign affairs debate, preferably a two-day debate. Will the right hon. Gentleman arrange for such a debate as soon as possible after the House reconvenes on 3 June?

We regret that only three hours is to be given to the Second Reading of the Legal Aid (Scotland) Bill. Could not the right hon. Gentleman postpone the Second Reading of the Sex Discrimination Bill on Thursday so that the Scottish legislation could receive longer consideration on that day in its place?

May I remind the right hon. Gentleman of the need for debates on the arts and conservation policy and urge him to ensure that time is quickly provided?

Will the right hon. Gentleman also ensure that we have a debate upon manning in the Metropolitan police, especially in the light of today's news that the increase in officers sought by Sir Kenneth Newman is not to be met, despite the Prime Minister's undertaking at the Conservative party conference last year that "Should the police need more men, more equipment, they shall have them."

Finally, in view of the disputes this week, will the right hon. Gentleman arrange for a debate in the near future on the resource allocation working party and its operation in the National Health Service? Such a debate is necessary so that Conservative Members who represent London, excluding the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher), can give a proper airing to the view that they have expressed in a letter to the Prime Minister that the Government are selling London short in health terms.

Mr. Biffen: May I respond to the points made by the Leader of the Opposition in reverse order?

I am sure that a debate on the allocation of resources in the NHS would command general interest and would also give the Government the opportunity to deploy their formidable case in that area. But at the moment, as the right hon. Gentleman will know, the pressure on the time of the House intensifies as we approach the end of July. However, that is a matter that we can consider.

I shall, of course, refer the points about the Metropolitan police to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

I note the interest in debates on the arts and conservation, and doubtless that can feature in discussions through the usual channels.

I take account of the request that more time should be made available for the Legal Aid (Scotland) Bill, but again that is something that can best be pursued through the usual channels.

I agree that there will be great merit in arranging a debate upon foreign affairs as soon as reasonably practical and convenient after——

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): The right hon. Gentleman says that every time.

Mr. Biffen: Of course I say it every time. It is the best thing that I have to say. The hon. Gentleman will not ultimately be disappointed in this matter.

I note the request for a debate on unemployment. It can be attended to through the usual channels.

I am happy that it was recognised that the Government fully identify the shipbuilding industry as being a matter of major industrial and current political concern. I am grateful that there is recognition of that in the debate that we have arranged. I note it is thought not to be of maximum convenience, but perhaps that is also something that we can look at through the usual channels.

Mr. Terence Higgins (Worthing): With reference to Tuesday's important debate on the Privileges Select Committee report, has my right hon. Friend seen the inaccurate and misleading letter written to hon. Members by members of the parliamentary Lobby journalists which referred throughout to the leaking of a Select Committee report when in fact it was the leak of a draft chairman's report? As the coverage of this matter in the press has perhaps been less than balanced, will my right hon. Friend urge right hon. and hon. Members to read the full report and the evidence before taking a view on the matter?

Mr. Biffen: I have seen the letter, and, indeed, I suspect, most Members of the House have had that advantage. My right hon. Friend makes a pertinent commentary upon it, and it will be to the great advantage of the House if it has a chance to take account of those views.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): In view of the decision of the Central Electricity Generating Board not to publish the board of inquiry report into Hinkley Point, and in view of the decision of the nuclear inspectorate not to publish the 20-year inquiry report into the Magnox reactors, will the Leader of the House arrange for the Secretary of State for Energy to make a statement on both of those matters next week?

Mr. Biffen: I note the hon. Gentleman's request. Although we have recently had a wide-ranging debate on that topic, I shall certainly draw his remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): Is my right hon. Friend aware that information has recently come to light to suggest that the person who proposed the motion, subsequently taken up by the National Union of Journalists, to send condolences to President Gaddafi of Libya is a gentleman of Iraqi origin who is the head of the Libyan news agency, Jana, in London? He came to this country in 1978 as a political refugee, and was subsequently granted political asylum. Is not the fact that the NUJ paid attention to such an individual a shaming indictment of the activities of its leadership? Is it not about time that it apologised to the British public for its extraordinary antics?

Mr. Biffen: I suspect that very few hon. Members knew about that information, but it represents an interesting commentary on that resolution, and I am sure that there will be interest in the NUJ's reaction to it.

Mr. James Callaghan (Cardiff, South and Penarth): May I reinforce the request of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition that the Government might reconsider the time that they have kindly given for a debate on the shipbuilding industry? Will the Leader of the House bear in mind that the fortunes of the shipping industry and the Royal Navy are bound up in the shipbuilding industry? Will he therefore consider giving a full day's consideration to that most important subject?

Mr. Biffen: I note what the right hon. Gentleman says, and I have no doubt that that, too, will be assessed by the usual channels.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): Is my right hon. Friend aware that I shall not trouble him today about the early-day motion concerning the miscarriage of justice in the Maguire case?

[That this House notes the widespread concern felt in Parliament by eminent scientists, by other responsible observers and by members of the public who have viewed programmes on the matter screened by Channel 4, that Anne Maguire, Patrick Maguire (senior), Vincent Maguire (then aged 17), Patrick Maguire (then aged 14), Sean Smyth, Patrick O'Neill and the late Giuseppe Conlan, sentenced in 1976 to long terms of imprisonment since served, now appear, despite confirmation of their convictions at the time by the Court of Appeal, to have been entirely innocent of the crime with which they were charged; further notes at the conclusion of a debate in the other place on 17th May 1975, the recognition by the Parliamentary Under Secretary at the Home Office of the strength of feeling on this matter in that House and his pledge to draw the attention of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to what had been said; and therefore earnestly urges the Secretary of State for the Home Department in the interests of the highest standards of British justice of which this country needs to feel rightly proud, to move without delay for a review of these convictions, either under the provisions of section 17 of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968, or by such other public process of review as he may deem appropriate to this disturbing case.]

Instead, may I ask my right hon. Friend to recall the regret that he shared with me at the displacement of the Whitsun holiday by the spring holiday? Should not the House set a better example and not sit on a Whit Monday, thereby downgrading the birthday of the Christian Church?

Mr. Biffen: I think that I can just about recognise the outlines of a banana skin in my hon. Friend's final observation. I should like to give further thought to his well-intentioned observation. While reminiscing, I should point out that I did not immediately answer the Leader of the Opposition's question. But, in my judgment, my hon. Friend is absolutely right about how Hansard treated the remarks of Leo Amery.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that he did not sound very convincing when he said that he would welcome a debate on the under-funding of the NHS, because he then pleaded shortage of time? Does he realise that a debate would not simply involve London versus the rest? From our experience in north Staffordshire, we know that it simply is not true that other areas prosper while London declines. In north Staffordshire we have had red alerts every week bar one throughout the winter. London has had just one week of red alerts.

Mr. Biffen: Of course I appreciate that any debate on the NHS would be truncated if it referred merely to the health services in the London area. But I would have to accommodate such a debate within the discipline of all the other demands that are made on parliamentary time as we approach a period of peak demand.

Mr. Bob Clay (Sunderland, North): Will the right hon. Gentleman ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to come to the House at the earliest opportunity to explain something that he said yesterday, during questions on the statement on British Shipbuilders? He said:

> "If an adequate number of orders can be found to keep those yards open, that will be highly desirable and something that I would welcome."—[Official Report, 14 May, 1986; Vol. 97, c. 716.]

Two hours before he said that, British Shipbuilders told the trade unions in Newcastle that, whatever orders were found, those yards would close and that the redundancies announced would go ahead. That has been checked and confirmed again this morning.

Does the Secretary of State know what is going on? Did he knowingly mislead the House? Who is in charge—the Secretary of State or British Shipbuilders, which seems hell-bent on running down the industry whether or not it obtains orders? Will the Secretary of State come to the House, because the matter cannot wait until the debate next week? People who are being made redundant and whose yards are threatened with closure want to know what is happening.

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman made a number of generalised accusations, including one against the good name of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. I reject any accusation of ill faith against my right hon. Friend.

The hon. Gentleman asked me to refer his remarks to my right hon. Friend, and of course I shall do so.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Is it possible at some time to have a debate on constitutional matters during which we could perhaps discuss hung Parliaments and coalition Parliaments, among other things? In particular, the House could take note of the fact that people in Cambridgeshire and elsewhere who have experienced the horrors of a Lib-Lab coalition detested what they saw and decisively rejected it.

Mr. Biffen: The prospect of a convincing Conservative majority after the next election should lift from my hon. Friend all those agonies. Of course, I undertake to consider an interesting constitutional innovation, not least because it would be helpful if the Opposition parties, especially the Liberal and Social Democratic parties, were to be a little more forthcoming about how they would react to the situation outlined by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Robert Kilroy-Silk (Knowsley, North): Will the Leader of the House try to be a little more sympathetic to and forthcoming about the request of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition for an early debate on unemployment? Would it not be appropriate, on the day on which record unemployment figures have been announced, for the right hon. Gentleman to say that there will be an early opportunity to discuss the increasing and horrendous levels of unemployment on Merseyside, and in particular the recent redundancies in Kirby in my constituency? Is it not time that my constituents were given some semblance of an idea of what prospects the Government hold out of them ever having permanent, full-time employment?

Mr. Biffen: I think that I responded in a prudent and realistic manner to the Leader of the Opposition, and I would hope that he would feel that it was a reasonable answer.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): Will my right hon. Friend ensure that next Wednesday's debate on the NIREX special development order is at least a three-hour debate? I recognise that he is under no great pressure in that the Labour party is committed to this policy and the Liberal party chief whip has endorsed burial of nuclear waste in surface facilities — but I am not and do not. My constituents and those in related constituencies insist on having our case fully put, and one and a half hours is an insufficient time in which to do so.

Mr. Biffen: I take note of my hon. Friend's remarks. I think that the question of timing might reasonably be considered through the usual channels.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): In view of the widespread interest in Scotland in the Legal Aid (Scotland) Bill, will the right hon. Gentleman sympathetically consider the request by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition for further time to discuss that very important matter?

Mr. Biffen: I do not think that I can go beyond the reply that I gave to the Leader of the Opposition, but I have of course, noted the hon. Gentleman's remarks.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Will my right hon. Friend bring forward to the earliest possible date the debate on the defence Estimates, because defence spending in real terms is to go down by 6 per cent. and there is also an urgent need for an expanded naval shipbuilding programme for strategic as well as good industrial and social reasons?

Mr. Biffen: I understand my hon. Friend's point. I am sure that he will realise that there is much merit in having the report of the Select Committee available before the debate takes place.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge): May I press the right hon. Gentleman once again on the need for an early debate on the funding of the NHS? Is he aware that the Prime Minister, on more than one occasion this week, has implied that the north of England is better off as a result of a reallocation of NHS resources?

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, despite that, the Newcastle district health authority has reported that there is no possibility of meeting its budget in either the short or the long term without ward closures? That has resulted in a proposal to close the Fleming memorial hospital, which for almost 100 years has provided highly specialised services for children.

The Prime Minister said that the north is better off. Will she explain that to those who rightly ask how, given that disastrous set of circumstances, the north can possibly be better off? Can there be an early debate so that the matter may be clarified?

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not think it an unfair comment if I said that he has just presented a miniature speech rather than a request. However, I notice that it did include a request.

The Government have such a formidable case on the provision of hospital building and health services that we would be happy to have a debate, but its timing must be considered through the usual channels.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): At the Venice meeting of the Western European Union the Council of Ministers was reluctant to envisage any progress in the reactivation of WEU. Does my right hon. Friend agree that that should be the subject of debate in the Chamber as the WEU is the second layer to NATO?

Mr. Biffen: I understand my hon. Friend's attachment to the WEU. Indeed, the House has a long and enduring relationship with that body. The best that I can do in the first instance is to refer my hon. Friend's comments to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Can the Leader of the House confirm that there will be only a single motion for the debate on the Privileges Committee report on Tuesday? As privilege is widely misunderstood—and not only outside the House—and as the recommendation links the alleged breach of privilege with a specific penalty, would it not be better for the House to take the alleged breach of privilege and the proposed penalty as separate questions?

Mr. Biffen: The motion has already been tabled and has appeared on the Order Paper for, I think, at least two days. Any other arrangements must be within the gift of the Chair.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): My question also relates to next Tuesday's debate on privilege. Given the importance of this matter both to journalists who work in this place and to hon. Members, can my right hon. Friend assure us that the debate will be taken at a reasonable time —perhaps 10 o'clock, and no later—and that there will be plenty of time to deal with matter?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend makes a fair point. I think that the business that I have announced gives a clear indication of when we expect the debate to get under way. I take this opportunity to say that I hope that the length of the dabate will be broadly similar to that when The Economist issue was debated.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Has the Leader of the House had an opportunity to study early-day motion No. 851 concerning the nuclear threat to Salisbury Plain occasioned by cruise missiles touring around Salisbury Plain last weekend?

[That this House notes that over the weekend period of 7th to 12th May a large convoy of military vehicles accompanied a cruise missile launcher around Salisbury Plain; regrets the danger to local people of this convoy; is appalled that roads around Tilshead were closed to prevent the public seeing the missiles; further regrets that a United States Army vehicle carrying messages to the convoy crashed in the churchyard fence at Tilshead Parish Church but congratulates those who were able to write peace signs on its side windows; and finally recognises that cruise missiles are not wanted in the United Kingdom.]

Does the right hon. Gentleman think that, in view of the denial of civil liberties to the people of that area through road closures, police presence and harassment and the sheer inefficiency of clogging roads with military vehicles for several days, the Secretary of State for Defence should come to the House and explain what the danger is to people in that area and the rest of the country rom those missiles touring around? Should not the Secretary of State also tell the House what he proposes to do to protect the people of that area from the massive police presence that seems to occasion American missiles every time they are let loose on our roads?

Mr. Biffen: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's strictures on either the armed forces or the police. I shall, of course, draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence to the anxieties that the hon. Gentleman has expressed.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Does my right hon. Friend realise that the Building Societies Bill completed its Committee stage at the end of February, yet we still await its Report stage? As this is an important and, indeed, growing part of the Government's housing policy, will my right hon. Friend please bring the Bill forward for Report as quickly as possible?

Mr. Biffen: I take note of what my hon. Friend has said. I know only too well the significance of the Bill for the building industry generally. As my hon. Friend can see, it does not feature in the business for next week, but I hope that it will not be too long delayed.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): Will the Leader of the House give us an assurance that the debate on shipbuilding next week will be wide-ranging? Is he aware that the closure of Smith's Dock on Teesside, adding to the already record levels of unemployment in Cleveland, has been a devastating blow to the entire community? Will he provide an opportunity for Ministers from the Department of the Environment, the Department of Employment and other Departments who should be involved in the solutions to these problems to respond to the issues raised in the debate?

Mr. Biffen: I shall ensure that the hon. Gentleman's remarks are borne in mind by those who will draft the motion. The Ministers who will take part in the debate will be so drawn as to enable the debate to be dealt with in the broadest sense.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): May I support my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) in asking for increased time for the debate on nuclear waste that is to take place on Wednesday? Many Members have an interest in the matter and many will wish to contribute to the debate. After the Minister has spoken, there will not be much time left for Back Benchers. I believe that the debate should be given added mileage.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Well done.

Mr. Biffen: I understand the point that has been made by my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Sir K. Lewis), and elaborated on from a sedentary position by my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg). Were it not for these remarks, "Speak for England" would have to rely on the Press Gallery.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): The Leader of the House will know that some weeks ago the Government published a report on irradiated food and its suitability or otherwise for the populace. He should know that representations have to be submitted by the end of July, and he should know also that the Minister responsible for these matters has refused to give me information which I consider it essential to have in my possession for any representations that I may make in response to the report. Will he tell me how, through the procedures of the House, I can get information which I consider to be essential?

Mr. Biffen: In the first instance, the hon. Gentleman might like to ventilate the matter in an Adjournment debate. The Minister would then be able to deal fully with the issues concerned in public view, as it were.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): Will my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House consider again the importance of having an economic debate, if not next week, then perhaps after the recess, not least because it would relate to some of the implications of his remarks which were made last Sunday on television, and because when we consider our position among OECD countries the alarming reality is hitting us more and more that we are the least investing country among the large and advanced economies, so called? Our rate of asset reinvestment is about one fifth of that which Japan is achieving, and its GNP is already much greater than ours. This is becoming a serious matter, not least for the unemployed.

Mr. Biffen: Today's unemployment figures clearly add to the general interest in economic affairs. I think that my hon. Friend will agree that the House has fairly frequent opportunities of debating economic matters, but I shall bear his request in mind. He will have heard that there are many other requests for debates against which his request will have to be taken.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Will the Leader of the House reconsider his reply to me last week and his refusal to arrange for a debate, statement or inquiry into the murders and disappearance of British servicemen after their interrogation by German Army Group E — Kurt Waldheim being in charge of the interrogation — especially in the light of documentary evidence that is now available of British soldiers being sent for special treatment according to the Fuhrer's order — in other words, for their elimination? Surely this is a matter which the Government cannot turn aside by saying that it has nothing to do with them.

Mr. Biffen: The hon. and learned Gentleman has written to me on these matters and I have replied to him today.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Is my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House aware of an apparent flaw in the Surrogacy Arrangements Act 1985 whereby ladies entering into surrogacy arrangement contracts are being paid to keep a diary, such arrangements being contrary to the spirit of the Act? May we have an opportunity to debate that and the lack of provision currently for religious education in our schools? Many schools are offering peace studies rather than true religious education.

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that the issue raised by my hon. Friend would make the subject of a lively and constructive debate. I must ask him, however, to observe the demands for debates on a wide range of topics which have been made this afternoon. It would be misleading if I said that one could be arranged at an early date.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): Is the Leader of the House aware that two and three quarter hours to discuss the special development order for the NIREX disposal site is entirely inadequate? Conservative Members who support the nuclear industry but do not want it in their back yard will wish to speak. Secondly, it will take two and three quarter hours for the alliance to explain how it agrees with the Labour party when it is in favour of an independent nuclear deterrent, which means that it is necessary to produce plutonium, which in turn makes it necessary to have reprocessing. The alliance is in favour of getting rid of Sellafield, but it would have to keep it to produce plutonium for the independent nuclear deterrent. Why was the alliance established, and why did members of the SDP leave the Labour party? Are they all unilateralists now?

Mr. Biffen: If all those matters really are the consequence of a special development order of the Department of the Environment, I understand why there is a request for more time. As I have said, the matter can be considered through the usual channels.

Mr. David Madel (Bedfordshire, South-West): Has my right hon. Friend noticed that wage negotiations in the electricity supply industry have broken down, with a threatened overtime ban on 25 May? As it is essential for the well-being of the nation that there is industrial peace in the electricity supply industry, will the Government arrange for a statement to be made next week to explain how they hope to help the management and unions out of their present difficulties?

Mr. Biffen: I do not think that anyone in the House will underestimate the serious implications of industrial action in the electricity supply industry. I am sure that everyone will wish the House to act in the most constructive way possible to secure an early resolution of the dispute. I shall refer my hon. Friend's remarks to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on when it might be appropriate to make a statement.

Mr. Leo Abse (Torfaen): May I again draw the attention of the Leader of the House to the early-day motion standing in my name, which has been signed by 101 Members, relating to family courts?

[That this House welcomes the establishment of the Family Courts Campaign to promote the early implementation of family courts, following the support for family courts recently expressed by the Law Society, the Association of County Councils, the Association of Directors of Social Services and many other bodies; welcomes the recommendations of the report of the Matrimonial Causes Procedure Committee, particularly those relating to the establishment of conciliation in matrimonial proceedings; notes with concern that the report of the Law Commission on Family Law, Illegitimacy, has yet to be implemented; further notes that the joint study set up in July 1984 by the Lord Chancellor and the Secretary of State for the Home Department to re-examine the idea of a unified family court, and study the resources implications in terms of finance, manpower and accommodation is due to be published shortly; regrets that this study has been so long delayed; and urges the Lord Chancellor and the Secretary of State for the Home Department to come forward with proposals for legislation at the earliest opportunity, following the publication of their report and their subsequent consultation on the most appropriate model for implementation.]

Bearing in mind the legitimate anxiety expressed yesterday by HRH Princess Margaret and the widespread belief—I do not know why the right hon. Gentleman is smiling—that there is a need for a genuine family court if we are to deal with the problems of child abuse and child neglect, will he provide an opportunity for a debate during which we shall be able to discuss the arid and legalistic report that was issued this week—as arid and legalistic as is The Times editorial this morning — and reflect public opinion, thereby showing the wide gap on this issue between the legalistic bureaucrats in the Lord Chancellor's Department and the Treasury and the House?

Mr. Biffen: The smile that crossed my face was one of appreciation and admiration of the skill with which the hon. Gentleman develops his argument and his case, which from now onwards will have "By Royal Appointment" stamped well and truly upon it. I shall consider his request for a debate, but he will know the difficulties that face me. I appreciate that the issue which he has raised has a real House of Commons interest.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Will my right hon. Friend make arrangements for an early debate on the most important Audit Commission report on education, which calls for the closure of 1,000 comprehensive schools over the next few years and the consequent redundancy of 5,000 teachers per year in addition to natural wastage, as well as making the valuable suggestion that there should be better payment of extra good teachers? This is a crucial report for the country generally and for the education service especially. I should be grateful if my right hon. Friend would arrange an early and wide-ranging debate upon it.

Mr. Biffen: I cannot in all conscience promise that there is the prospect of an early and wide-ranging debate on the report. I shall draw the remarks of my hon. Friend to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science. I know that there will be genuine public interest in any proposal which involves such massive school closures.

Mrs. Renée Short (Wolverhampton, North-East): May I reinforce the argument of my hon. and, in view of his recent activity perhaps I should say learned, Friend the Member for Torfaen (Mr. Abse) about the need to debate a family court structure? I remind the Leader of the House that the Select Committee, in its report on the care of children, made a strong recommendation in recommendation 36 that this issue could be examined. In view of the time that has been taken by the Lord Chancellor, does not the right hon. Gentleman think that it is high time to debate the issue in the House so that hon. Members can give guidance to the Government on what they feel should be introduced?

Mr. Biffen: I understand the point that the hon. Lady has made. She brought to the argument the authority of the Chairman of the appropriate departmental Select Committee. I do not think that I can go beyond what I said earlier.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): I reinforce the request that has been made by other hon. Members. I am grateful to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House who said that he will consider the matter through the usual channels. If he uses the usual channels for that purpose — bearing in mind that, during the recent debate on nuclear policy the Labour party and the Liberal party clearly acknowledged that they would go along with the special development order — he might receive the wrong answer. How will he use the usual channels for the request? Hon. Members are involved at a constituency level.

Mr. Biffen: I note charitably what my hon. Friend has said, but I think that he should be a little cautious before trying to elevate himself into a usual channel—it is not that great a life.

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): Is the Leader of the House aware that yesterday the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry informed Cornish Members that a final decision on at least one tin mine would be made in the first week of June? Does that mean that we cannot have a debate in the House before the final decision is made? Although we understand why we are having a debate next week about shipbuilding, will the Leader of the House explain to those who live in Cornwall why not one moment has been found in the past six months to discuss the tin industry?

Mr. Biffen: The matter has been considered by a departmental Select Committee. Its report and the Government's reactions to it ought to be a precondition for a debate. I take account of what the hon. Gentleman has said. I realise only too well that the matter is of immense significance in the Duchy.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): My right hon. Friend may recall a debate some weeks ago initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg) on the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive order. Because of a brilliant but somewhat lengthy speech by my right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine), I was unable to speak. As I and some of my hon. Friends intend to vote against the order, it is vital that we are given an opportunity to speak. Therefore, I earnestly request the Leader of the House to allow a three or four-hour debate.

Mr. Biffen: I will convey to my right hon. Friend the Patronage Secretary the fact that my hon. Friend intends to vote against the Government. I will also take account of the fact that he seeks an extended time for the debate.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): Does the Leader of the House consider that, in view of the obvious unease and disquiet about the problems that have occurred in the nuclear industry, it is time that we had a debate on the coal mining industry before we run into the 1960s danger of wasting millions of pounds investment? As the Government wish to turn the coal mining industry into a market situation, and as we are waving goodbye to the old chairman and welcoming the new chairman, does the Leader of the House agree that this is an appropriate time to state the House's position on an overall energy policy based on what we know is a safe fuel—coal?

Mr. Biffen: I said earlier that the hon. Gentleman made a persuasive case for the coal industry even though his remarks were, by necessity, somewhat brief. I cannot promise the prospect of an early debate on the coal industry, for reasons that have been apparent this afternoon. Many demands are being made on Government time. That does not in any sense diminish the importance of the point that the hon. Gentleman has made. I will see that it is conveyed to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): I refer to the request for a debate on NIREX and the special development order. The issue involved has caused great concern to the three or four parties that are affected. More than 120,000 people have signed a petition in Humberside, principally in south Humberside. I understand that the petition will be presented to the House of Commons on Wednesday. County councils, borough councils and district councils have had numerous public meetings which were attended by all my local hon. Friends who have spoken this afternoon. I strenuously urge my right hon. Friend to allow the debate to take place over three or four hours. The arguments against the NIREX proposals will be advanced only by Conservative Members. My right hon. Friend knows that they will not be advanced by the Opposition, because the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) has already given his view that a shallow-based disposal facility is satisfactory. Unless a three-hour debate is granted, the issues will not be satisfactorily canvassed by those hon. Members who are affected.

Mr. Biffen: I have said that the matter can be consiered further through the usual channels. I assure my hon. Friend that I shall make certain that his views are considered.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I ask the Leader of the House a question of which I gave him notice for a considered reply. In view of Roger Todd's well-researched article on the sinking of the Sheffield in the Daily Mirror, has the time come for discussion of the major minority report of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs on the events of 1 and 2 May 1982?

Mr. Biffen: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman who, with characteristic courtesy, informed me that he would raise the question. I will consider further the possibility of a debate on the Select Committee's report. It can be discussed through the usual channels.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): Does my right hon. Friend accept that, on remarriage, a war widow loses for ever her entitlement to a war widow's pension, and that on the death of any subsequent husband she cannot claim it with effect from that day? Is it not time that we had a debate on the subject of war widow's pensions so that we can discuss not only the level but the mechanics of entitlement that make the payment fairer, because at the moment widows are discouraged from remarrying?

Mr. Biffen: I agree entirely with what my hon. Friend has said. He has been a most effective campaigner for war widows. He is more likely to bring the matter to the Floor of the House through the technique ot an Adjournment debate than a general debate because, quite frankly, I do not think that there is time available.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): Does the right hon. Gentleman recall that on 27 March I drew his attention to early-day motions 204 and 217?

[That this House notes with concern that speech therapists, members of a highly-skilled caring profession, discharging a wide range of responsibilities, are underpaid in comparison with other National Health Service professionals doing work of equal value; notes also that speech therapy is traditionally a female profession; and calls upon Her Majesty's Government to provide sufficient funds to enable speech therapists' salary levels to be increased so that speech therapists receive equal pay for work of equal value.]

[That this House expresses its appreciation of the valuable work performed by speech therapists; and, in expressing its concern that decreasing comparative salary levels will dissuade the ablest of individuals from entering this profession, calls upon Her Majesty's Government to ensure that speech therapists are remunerated at a level equal to that of other graduate specialists within the National Health Service.]

The motions were signed by 119 and 87 hon. Members, respectively, on both sides of the House. At that time I told the right hon. Gentleman that there was a demand for a statement to be made by his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services. The Leader of the House, in his usual courteous and balanced way, said that he would draw the attention of his right hon. Friend to the demand. What has been the result of his representations?

Mr. Biffen: I think that I must have notice of that question.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): I reinforce the views of my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) in his request for a debate on education. Yesterday, Smith's Dock in Langbaurgh was closed and, for the second time in three years, an axe is hanging over schools in my constituency. It was reported today that a further 1,000 schools are liable to close in future. That cannot help young people in my constituency who saw their jobs disappearing yesterday and are seeing their schools disappearing today.

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend rightly alerts the House to what will be a general anxiety about a report which contains massive school closure proposals. However, they are just proposals from an advisory body. More generally, I refer him to the answer I gave earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway).

Mr. John Ryman (Blyth Valley): Last week I asked the Leader of the House a question about regional aid and the Government's policy, especially on the north-east region. The Leader of the House gave a reply which, unwittingly, was slightly helpful. Given the niggardly amount that the Government gave the north-east by way of regional aid, will he take whatever steps are necessary to ensure that the distribution of regional aid is efficient and quick?

Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a company in my constituency, Laceintel Ltd, has applied for regional aid which is desperately required to pay for industrial machinery and has to be paid by the end of next week? Unless the application is considered and granted by the end of next week, 55 jobs will be in jeopardy. Will the right hon. Gentleman have a word with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry about the matter and see whether he can expedite the consideration of the application?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly refer the problems outlined by the hon. Gentleman to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of early-day motion 845 in the name of my right hon. and hon. Friends?

[That this House regards with astonishment the refusal of the Secretary of State for Wales to meet Ogwr Borough Council about the critical job losses it has suffered, and about the need to restore development area status, the case for which was fuelled by the crisis created by the Ford announcement; regards this grave discourtesy to a major Welsh council as breaking the traditional availability of the Welsh Office Ministers to Members of Parliament and to the councils; and warns the Secretary of State that though he has slammed the Welsh Office doors in the face of the people of Wales he cannot hide indefinitely behind those doors from the wrath of the very people whose interests he should represent and champion.]

It concerns the refusal of the Secretary of State for Wales to meet Ogwr borough council to discuss the downgrading of development area status. If the right hon. Gentleman is not prepared to allow a debate next week on this vital issue, will he raise the matter in Cabinet to highlight the arrogance that is rubbing off the Prime Minister on to the Secretary of State for Wales? The Secretary of State will not meet the borough council. On Tuesday afternoon, 50 Ogwr borough councillors attended the House of Commons for the purpose of meeting the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State, or any other Tory Member of Parliament, yet not one of those invited turned up.

Mr. Biffen: I totally reject the hon. Gentleman's personal imputations against the character and behaviour of my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Wales. I do not believe that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has acted in this matter with any discourtesy. I cannot accept the hon. Gentleman's strictures.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): The right hon. Gentleman will be aware, even if he does not share the concern of many people, of the failure of the Department of the Environment and the Scottish Office to publish adequate information on radiation levels during the Chernobyl incident. Is he aware that my hon. Friend the Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) asked in a written question about maximum radiation levels which was answered in yesterday's Hansard? In that written answer, the Department of the Environment failed to do more than give details of average levels of radiation. Of course, those details are totally useless. Do the Government intend withholding information, or will the right hon. Gentleman ensure that Members of Parliament have access to such information?

Mr. Biffen: My right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for the Environment and the Secretary of State for Scotland have acted with great sensitivity and responsibility in this matter. I do not accept that there has been any sort of radiation information cover up. Of course, I shall refer the hon. Gentleman's anxieties to them.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): Has the Leader of the House seen early-day motion 844, which is supported by hon. Members on both sides of the House about the Charity Shield 1986?

[That this House, appreciating the excellent crowd behaviour, the true sportsmanship and the high standard of entertainment by the Everton and Liverpool football teams at the 1986 Cup Final, calls upon the Minister for Sport to ask the Football Association to allow Everton to participate in the 1986 Charity Shield; notes that Everton were runners-up in the First Division championship and the Challenge Cup and were participants in the 1984 and 1985 Charity Shield with similar excellent crowd behaviour, and rejects the suggestion that a foreign team should replace Everton in this traditional English charity event.]

We are delighted that Everton football club, and not a foreign team, will participate in the matches. Has the right hon. Gentleman seen early-day motion 840, which was tabled by, among others, my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer), which concerns the excellent behaviour of the Liverpool and Everton football clubs at the 1986 Football Association cup final?

[That this House congratulates Liverpool Football Club's team under Kenny Dalglish's managership, in winning the 1986 Football Association Cup Final; further congratulates Everton Football Club's team, under Howard Kendall's managership, for their great football and fine team spirit; believes that both teams and their supporters are a real credit to football in the United Kingdom and to the people of the City of Liverpool and Merseyside in particular; notes that the behaviour of the Liverpool and Everton football supporters at Wembley deserve praise from the police, proving that football crowds can be good-humoured and well-behaved and that they need not involve themselves in any form of violence; and concludes that the way in which almost half a million of the people of Liverpool turned out, Liverpool, Everton and non-club supporters alike, to greet the two clubs on their return to Liverpool, is proof beyond doubt that, despite all the problems of the Merseyside area, the spirit of the people remains good and that they deserve the support of the whole country.]

Will the right hon. Gentleman ask the Minister with responsibility for sport to make representations to the FA to support the re-entry of English teams in European competitions in the 1987-88 season?

Mr. Biffen: Because we all like to get on this bandwagon, I should like to say that I congratulate Merseyside on a good year for football, whatever else has happened.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): What about Shrewsbury?

Mr. Biffen: I have not congratulated Shrewsbury. I am showing a shrewd sense of realism. If one lives in Oswestry, one is as likely to look north-west as south-east. I shall, of course, take up the hon. Gentleman's other point with my hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for sport.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is it not true that someone on the Select Committee on the Environment has lied and, and in doing so, has dropped a journalist in the cart?

Mr. Biffen: I think that that is a point to be made in Tuesday evening's debate.

Mr. Martin J. O'Neill (Clackmannan): Does the right hon. Gentleman remember that, two weeks ago, I asked him to put in the Library a copy of the contract for the Trident submarine or to hold a debate on the issue? I in no way doubt the strenuousness of the right hon. Gentleman's efforts to fulfil either or both of those requests, but does not his inability to achieve this show the type of difficulties that the Daily Mirror has had to face in obtaining information about the sinking of the Sheffield? Should not a Defence Minister make a public statement in the House about the serious allegations in today's Daily Mirror about the deaths of 20 service men, if only to comfort the parents and families of those poor men?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman has taken up the point raised by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), although the hon. Gentleman seeks a statement. I shall, of course, refer his request to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): In a comment which appears now to have been a long time ago, the Leader of the House upheld yesterday's remarks to me by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry—notably that, if orders from China and Cuba were consummated, Smith's Dock on Teesside and other shipyards would remain open. That is very good news for my constituents who live in Middlesbrough. The information that we are negotiating with Cuba for an order for four vessels is most welcome. Will the right hon. Gentleman draw the attention of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to those facts? Will they be included in the debate next week?

Mr. Biffen: I take note of the hon. Gentleman's points. I shall certainly convey his remarks to my right hon. Friend.

Prime Minister's Question Time

4.35 pm

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowne and Stourbridge): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Earlier this afternoon you made some remarks about the conduct of the House during Prime Minister's Question Time. If I heard you correctly, you said—I am merely paraphrasing—that a certain amount of noise was inevitable in view of our customs and traditions, and that cheering was in order. I think that those remarks will have been heard with dismay by the many hundreds of thousands of those who listen to "Today in Parliament" or "Yesterday in Parliament", who think that already there is far too much noise during Prime Minister's Questions.

Not only foreigners, but English people, cannot understand it when, before the Prime Minister has time to reply to an Opposition question, there is so much shouting on the Opposition Benches that she has to repeat herself two or three times and shout. That happens in no other country or kingdom. Although I am all in favour of rumbustiousness here, surely what happens during Prime Minister's Question Time has gone too far and should be reined in.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. Member has raised this point, I point out that I was making a distinction between cheering and jeering.

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I realise that piety and self-righteousness are not among the attributes of the hon. Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Mr. Stokes). He appeared in his last contribution to stray, giving the impression that this side of the House is guilty of conduct that is inclined or intended to drown the contributions of the Prime Minister or of any other hon. Member. If the hon. Government were prepared to acknowledge—I note that he is listening—that this is a general fault, frequently repeated by the Conservative Benches, perhaps we could raise the standards of conduct by Government example.

Mr. Speaker: I subscribe to those views. Prime Minister's answers should generally be heard in greater silence. The point I was trying to make was that the "Hear, hears"—which are, I understand, the true interpretation of "Hear him", or perhaps even "Hear her"—have been traditional in the House for many centuries.

Special Development Order

4.37 pm

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Grantham): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek your guidance on your powers under Standing Order No. 4. As you will know, from what my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House said, next Wednesday we are to have a debate on the NIREX special development order. You may feel that there is a cosy agreement between the two Front Benches to limit the debate to one and a half hours. This may be because the Labour party, too, supports the policy of disposing of low-level nuclear waste in a shallow burial facility. It is the policy of the Liberal Chief Whip as well.

A number of constituencies are affected, and Fulbeck in my constituency is included. Our constituents would never forgive the House if their case was not fully argued. Under Standing Order No. 4, the debate on a prayer of this type ends automatically at 11.30 pm. As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, you have a residual discretion under the provisions of the Standing Order, if you hold that this is an important matter which has not been adequately discussed, to adjourn the debate for further argument. If the representatives of the affected constituencies——

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe): And those of neighbouring constituencies.

Mr. Hogg: —and the representatives of neighbouring constituencies—they will be the only ones putting the argument—are not called, will you consider sympathetically an invitation to invoke your residual power to adjourn the debate?

Mr. Speaker: That is a hypothetical question. Of course I shall do that; I always do.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sure you will have noticed the number of requests made to the Leader of the House. It is reasonable to assume that all those hon. Members might seek to catch your eye during that debate. During a one and a half-hour debate, it is reasonable to assume that not all those who this afternoon have made the case for a longer debate will be called, and they will very much welcome you using your power under the Standing Order referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg). I urge you to recognise that the debate on Wednesday is the only opportunity that we have to draw to the attention of the House the total and unanimous opposition of large numbers of people in four communities in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was under the impression earlier today that we were to have a three-hour debate on that prayer. I do not know from where I gathered that view. I had to be corrected by my hon. Friend the Chief Whip of the Parliamentary Labour party. If it would assist in any way, may I say that I and my right hon. and hon. Friends are disposed to agree to the prolongation of that debate, as this issue is of considerable importance to both sides of the House. I hope that even without invoking your intervention the Government will reconsider their business. I am sure that a three-hour debate would bring widespread satisfaction.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is an important matter and you are about to give an important ruling. You might at this stage say that you will adjourn the debate, because there are no Members of the Liberal party in the Chamber. They clearly do not care at all about the matter that we are to debate.

Mr. Speaker: That is also a hypothetical question. It may be of some comfort to the hon. Gentleman to know that during the debate I shall certainly bear in mind those who were not called in previous debates.

Spring Adjournment (Debates)

Mr. Speaker: I remind hon. Members that on the motion for the Adjournment of the House on Friday 23 May up to eight hon. Members may raise with Ministers subjects of their own choice. Applications should reach my office by 10 pm on Monday next. A ballot will be held on Tuesday morning and the result will be made known as soon as possible thereafter.

Orders of the Day

Wages Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), further considered.

New Clause 1

YOUNG PEOPLE

'Employers of workers under the age of 21 who undertake the same work as adults who are protected by Wages Councils Orders made under Part II of the Act shall pay such workers at least 70 per cent. of the minimum rate laid down in the Order and shall charge no more for accommodation than is allowable for adult workers.'.—[Ms. Clare Short.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

4.42 pm

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to take the following: New clause 2—Disabled workers—

'The provisions of Part II of this Act shall not apply to registered disabled workers.'.

Amendment No. 54, in clause 12, page 12, line 4, at beginning insert—

'With the exception of the special protection provided for registered disabled workers.'.

Amendment No. 58, in clause 12, page 12, line 23, leave out subsection (3).

Amendment No. 81, in clause 13, page 12, line 35, at end insert—

'(aa) the welfare of mentally or physically disabled workers in relation to whom the Wages Council concerned would cease to operate'.

Ms. Short: Today we move on to part II of the Wages Bill. Yesterday we made it clear that part I would lead to many workers, innocent of any offence, facing fines and deductions from their pay and having no adequate remedy to deal with that. It will also force many workers who are currently paid in cash and wish to continue to be paid in that way to move, without negotiation or consultation, to cashless pay. All of that is bad enough. We now move to part II of the Bill, which is much worse.

It is designed to cut the wages of some of Britain's poorest workers. There are about 3 million of them, and all of them will suffer. They are the workers protected by wages councils—special machinery established long ago and supported by all political parties to ensure that some of the poorest workers do not see ever-worsening rates of pay as worse and worse employers move into industry and undermine the pay that decent employers wish to give.

The Government are determined to change the little protection that those workers have. They say that it is necessary to cut the pay of the poorest workers in order to create more jobs. That is not true. If we all took a cut in pay there would be more unemployment and further deflation of the economy. Of course, part of the current problem is that the economy is too deflated already. It is obvious, on all international comparisons, that Britain's wages are very low.

The Government argue that we would compete better internationally if our wages dropped even further, so their argument is that we must compete with some of the poorest countries in the world paying incredibly low rates. That points us towards a real sweat-shop economy instead of towards the virtuous cycle that we should adopt of high investment, high skill training and high wages.

If the Government believe that thesis—we do not accept that wage cuts will create more jobs—why do they not ask those who can afford it best to accept wage cuts? Since the Government came to power the 20 per cent. of best paid workers have increased their incomes considerably. They have experienced considerable tax cuts which, accompanied by an increase in earnings have, led to an enormous increase in their standard of living. The lowest paid 20 per cent. of workers have, since 1979, seen a net drop in their standard of living. The increase in their pay has been less than the rate of inflation, and they are poorer now than they were in 1979.

The Government tell us that the rich need more incentives in order to work harder and in order that our economy should be more efficient. They have the cheek to tell us that the poorest workers should be paid less in order to help to deal with the problem of unemployment. That is outrageous. It is pure dogma and there is no evidence for their case. It is an attack on the poorest workers.

New clause 1 deals with the attack on the young. Five hundred thousand of the 3 million poorest workers are young workers, one in five of all young workers in Britain. The Government propose that in future there will be no protection for young workers. One would think that the opposite would be the case. One would think that in any decent country there would be care and concern to ensure that the young, who lack experience and might be more easily exploited, are protected when they first go to work so that they can start their adult working life within decent structures and with decent working conditions.

The International Labour Organisation was deeply shocked by Britain's move. We had to resile from the treaty so that the Government could introduce this legislation. The ILO told us:

"Almost all countries in the world now operate a minimum wage system and none to our knowledge excludes young workers."

Therefore, all the developed countries of the world and many Third-world countries manage to have a minimum wage system to protect their young workers. Henceforth, Britain does not intend to do so.

A myth has been put about simply by the constant repetition of the falsehood that high youth unemployment in Britain is due to high youth wages. That does not stand up to scrutiny. The movement of youth wages over a long period of time does not show that there is any connection between movement in youth wages and movement in youth unemployment. In fact, since 1979 youth unemployment has doubled and youth wages have dropped considerably. Of course, the Government are not content with that and wish to see even further drops in the pay of our young people.

What are the princely sums that the Government consider too high? The sums allocated to young workers under existing wage orders are £40 to £50 per week. I do not know whether Conservative Members understand that after tax and national insurance and after bus fares and meals have been paid for, the young people are left with very little more than they would receive on supplementary benefit. They are working for very little simply because they wish to work.

In Committee we witnessed crocodile tears about the Tory party's concern for the young unemployed. Conservative Members told us how deeply worried they were and how the only answer for our young people was that their wages should be cut so that more of them might get jobs. It is true that our young people are desperate. It is true, for example, that the suicide rate for young people is rising faster than for any other age group. It was proved, I believe, by research studies at Leicester university a couple of years ago that there is a link between youth unemployment and the suicide rate among our young people. There is no doubt that they are desperate and that they are suffering. The Government intend to exploit that desperation to lever their wages down even further.

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): In Committee, the hon. Lady consistently misrepresented that argument. Surely the purpose is not to push down young people's wages; it is to attempt to create more jobs for young people by not setting artificially high minimum wage levels. It is entirely different.

Ms. Short: The argument is exactly the same. The words that are used are different. The hon. Gentleman says that if youth wages go down, there will be more jobs. That means that young people who are in work now on low wages will get lower wages. There is no evidence that there will be more jobs for young people. Inevitably, the poor low-paid young worker will be even poorer and even lower paid. At the moment wages councils set rates for them. The Government say that those rates are too high and want lower rates to be set. That is the purpose of the part of the Bill that we are contesting in the new clause.

The Government have been at this for a long time. They have tried all sorts of measures to lever down youth wages. The first was the deliberate adoption of policies to increase unemployment and make workers, including young people, settle for lower wages. The most blatant was the young workers scheme, which gave a massive subsidy to encourage employers to cut youth wages—£15 a week if they paid less than £40, under the scheme's initial form. We learned from that that a high proportion of the jobs that were subsidised would have existed anyway. So the whole expensive scheme was not generating new jobs.

Of the jobs that were generated—about 10 or 20 per cent. at most of the jobs that were subsidised—the vast majority were previously adult jobs. An adult was thrown out of work so that a young subsidised worker could be taken on. In so far as the Government's proposal creates a marginal increase in jobs for young people, it is at the expense of adult workers. The mothers will be thrown out. There is an overwhelming number of women workers in low-paid employment. They will be thrown out of work so that young people can be taken on at disgracefully low rates of pay. They in turn will be thrown out when they reach 21 so that some other desperate young person can be taken on for an unacceptably low rate of pay.

New clause 2 refers to disabled people. There are many disabled young workers. Under the Wages Councils Act 1979 scheme, disabled workers had to be paid the legally required rates unless there was an application for an exemption, arguing that there was some reason why a disabled worker could not work as efficiently as another. All wages councils were careful to ensure that disabled workers were not exploited. Only about 80 licences per year were granted to enable employers to pay less than the legal minimum rate. In sweeping away the protection for all workers under 21, the Government are sweeping away protection for disabled young workers and saying that it is a free market and that employers can exploit young disabled people as much as they like and pay them whatever they like. It is a free rein for the market. It is outrageous and sickening.

The Government pretend that they are making the change because they care for the young and want to help them to work. It is not true. If it were, there would be a change in economic policy. Without that, we shall not acccept any argument from the Tory Benches that pretends for one minute that they have any concern for the unemployed. The truth is that, all over the developed world, when unemployment rises, youth unemployment rises more rapidly because young workers are marginal and lack skills and experience. When employers are not recruiting, it is the young whom they will not recruit first. The way in which to reduce youth unemployment is to lower the general level of unemployment. In every developed country, when unemployment falls, youth unemployment falls rapidly. The only way in which young workers will get back into jobs is through a change of economic policy which generates jobs for all young people.

Mr. Geoff Lawler (Bradford, North): I thought that by now the hon. Lady would have accepted the economic realities of life. If what she says were so, why, in Germany, where there are more realistic wage levels for young people, is youth unemployment about the same proportion as general unemployment, whereas in this country it is about twice as high?

Ms. Short: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman is not well informed about Germany. Rising unemployment hit Germany later than it hit this country. The application of monetarism came to it later. When unemployment rose, youth unemployment rose too. The pattern is the same throughout the EEC: a study of some years ago documents it.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): May I add to my hon. Friend's explanation? The Tories put forward the fallacy that young people's wages as a proportion of adult rates are less in Germany than in this country. That fallacy is clouded by the fact that the hourly manufacturing earnings of workers in Germany are at least 40 per cent. higher than in this country. The reason why unemployment rose at a slower pace in Germany is that in the late 1970s and early 1980s the Government expelled over 1 million gastarbeiter back to countries such as Spain and Turkey. Is that the Tories' solution—to expel 1 million of the immigrant workers in this country to reduce unemployment?

Ms. Short: I am sure that hon. Members are listening to my hon. Friend's points.

The Government's policy is immoral. It is immoral to attack the poorest and to seek to generate greater inequality. The Government have achieved a massive increase in inequality since 1979. The Bill is intended to take it further and make poor workers even poorer. It is based on an economic fiction. The Labour party is absolutely opposed to everything that the Government are seeking to do in part II. We are committed to reversing it.

[Ms. Short]

The way things are going, we expect to do it quite soon. We in the Labour party will introduce a national minimum wage with appropriate rates for young people.

The Tory party should be deeply ashamed of itself in seeking to attack the living standards of the poor, the young, young black workers, women workers and disabled workers. That is what they are doing in part II. New clause 1 is an attempt to reverse some of that damage.

The Paymaster General and Minister for Employment (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): We intend to have a reasonably short debate, but this is an important issue which goes to the root of the Bill. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will reply to the debate and concentrate on the new clause and amendments concerned with disabled workers.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) has just made her case on behalf of the Labour party, but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Maples) said, she puts the case for and against the Bill in a curious way. The Government have made it clear throughout that our objective in introducing the Bill is to increase employment opportunities, particularly for young people. Although the hon. Lady speaks with considerable passion, I cannot believe that she really thinks that we are motivated by a curious desire to drive down wages for its own sake or to extend the rate of poverty. The language that she uses always implies that.

More worrying than the eccentricity of approach that that betrays is the fact that the hon. Lady seems to be going back to a position where she almost completely denies any link between rates of pay and employment prospects. She brushes aside remarks about comparative rates of pay for young people and employment——

Mr. Nellist indicated assent.

Mr. Clarke: I see the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) nodding vigorous assent. I shall come back to that matter in a moment. I wonder where the new realism of the Labour party has gone. We are back into a new higher wage campaign regardless of the impact on employment in general, and particularly that of young people.

New clause 1 goes in totally the opposite direction to our proposal to enable young and inexperienced workers to take a wage that is more likely to induce the employer to offer them their first step into the labour market. The new clause suggests that we should retain an arbitrarily fixed rate of pay for young people who are regarded as undertaking the same work as adults. It does not explain how on earth we shall determine whether the young person is doing the same work as an adult, but, from remarks made yesterday, it appears that we shall have something along the lines of equal value for equal work being determined by tribunals.

The new clause suggests that a definite relationship between young people's earnings and those of adult workers should be fixed by the wages councils, which is not so at the moment. It says that at least 70 per cent. of the adult rate should be paid to 16 and 17-year-olds. That is driving up the relationship between young people's and adult wages, compared with the present position. No fixed minimum for young people is provided for in the existing legislation. The existing wages orders lay down an average of about 65 per cent. of the adult wage for 16-year-olds The Labour party's new clause would immediately increase the pay of those who have come straight out of school and bring it nearer to the pay of experienced adult workers. The hon. Member for Ladywood speaks with great sincerity and passion, but she is fervently arguing for a change which would deny job opportunities to very many young people.

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): The Paymaster General must know that a three-year apprenticeship for young people is recognised by certain industries. If somebody leaves school at 16 and completes a three-year apprenticeship, he could be doing the work of a skilled worker before he reached the age of 21. Is the Paymaster General saying that the employer will pass on to the customer the saving that he makes by employing a young worker or will he put it into his own pocket? That would be exploitation.

Mr. Clarke: There is nothing to prevent employers in any industry from moving a young employee on to the full adult wage as soon as that employee is making as full a contribution as an adult worker. Apprenticeships lead people on to fully qualified craft rates, but that does not apply to wages council industries. Apprenticeships do not need to be backed by law. We are dealing with a provision that would make it obligatory for a 16-year-old to be paid 70 per cent. of the adult wage. Given the choice, all employers would prefer to employ an experienced adult worker rather than a young worker. The Labour party's policy would make it illegal to offer somebody a lower wage while he was training and acquiring a skill. We believe that as soon as he is able to do all that an adult worker can do, he should receive the adult worker's wage.

Ms. Clare Short: A number of different formulations are included in this series of amendments. The Labour party is seeking to maintain protection for young people. The Labour party suggests that we should stay with the 1979 Act and give each wages council the right to pay young people whatever rate it thinks fit. The Paymaster General will be aware that a number of wages councils are unhappy about his proposals, particularly about the movement of the age of majority from 18 to 21. Therefore, he should not concentrate on the provisions of new clause 1. The Opposition would settle for a return to the 1979 Act.

Mr. Clarke: I am relieved to hear that the hon. Lady is showing a little flexibility. However, I do not believe that she is protecting young people. She is telling young people who work in these industries that they will all get higher pay, but she will deny job opportunities to many of them. That is not protection.

The new clause is part of the initiative against low pay which the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) mentioned yesterday, and it is closely attached to part II. Yesterday the Labour party may have called it a campaign against low pay, but I prefer to call in the Labour party's new campaign for higher pay, particularly higher pay for the young, the inexperienced, and the unskilled.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East) rose——

Mr. Clarke: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment.

I have in front of me a copy of the hon. Gentleman's news release, in which he explained that he was setting out the Labour party's new approach. According to his definition, no fewer than 8 million people receive poverty wages. That is one third of the entire work force. His policy would raise the pay of those 8 million people—a third of the entire work force—and it would depend upon a combination of measures. In particular, it would depend upon the level of the statutory minimum wage. The hon. Gentleman yesterday, and the hon. Member for Ladywood today, made it quite clear that the Labour party is committed to that policy. If we are to raise the wages of a third of the work force, at some stage the hon. Lady ought to tell us what level of pay increase she proposes, and what impact this campaign for higher pay for 8 million people will have on the rest of the work force. I refer to adult workers, male workers and workers with skills.

Yesterday the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East was at pains to assure those workers that they, too, would share in this bonanza. He said that the Labour party's policy would not hold anybody back. A national minimum wage would provide a floor below which no worker would be allowed to fall and that, as unions would still be able to negotiate above that floor, there would be no danger of it becoming a ceiling for pay settlements. No mention was made yesterday of productivity, performance or output.

The Labour party's campaign is designed to inform people that a third of the labour force will receive higher pay. If that is associated with the hon. Gentleman's remarks about changes to trade union legislation, it means that it will be rather easier for those who want to maintain their differentials to take industrial action. The strike weapon will be strengthened to ensure that they are able to maintain those differentials.

This drive for generally higher pay throughout the economy, particularly at the bottom end of the scale, has come at a time when employment in this country is increasing at a faster rate than ever before. Since the spring of 1983, nearly 1 million new jobs have been created. The most worrying threat to the creation of new jobs is higher unit labour costs in this country compared with those in other countries. I have the comparisons in front of me. The latest quarterly figures that are available for 1985 show that in Canada wages and salaries per unit of output in manufacturing increased by 1 per cent., in the Federal Republic of Germany by 2 per cent. and in the United Kingdom by 6 per cent., whereas in Japan they did not rise at all. If one takes the whole-year figures for 1984, our unit wage costs in manufacturing increased by 4 per cent., whereas they declined by 2 per cent. in Canada, by 1 per cent. in the United States, by 4 per cent. in Japan and by 1 per cent. in the Federal Republic of Germany.

Mr. Nellist: Will the Minister give way on that matter?

Mr. Clarke: The Labour party is campaigning for a general surge in wage costs at a time when our unit wage costs in manufacturing are rising at a faster rate than those of our competitors, when the living standards of those who are in work in this country are higher than ever before and when domestic inflation is falling rapidly.

Mr. Nellist: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Clarke: This policy will not protect the low-paid, the young, or anybody else. If the Labour party embarked upon this policy, it would drive up unemployment.

Mr. Nellist: Is the Paymaster General not aware that there are two halves to a fraction? If industrial manufacturing output has declined, the equation will naturally be higher. If he looks at his answers to me during the last few days relating to the hourly earnings of workers in manufacturing industry in Britain, Italy, France and Germany, he will find that the pay of workers in those countries has risen faster than in this country and that it has been based upon higher investment.

Mr. Clarke: If there is one thing that is more likely than anything else to cause a fall in manufacturing output in this country, it is to allow our unit wage costs to rise in comparison with those of our competitors. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to ignore our competitive position, he is encouraging a decline in our manufacturing industry.

Mr. Maples: On my right hon. and learned Friend's point about the Labour party's proposals for massive pay increases, I should point out that this experiment was put into effect in 1974. Under a Labour Government there was a massive rise in wages, but there was no rise in production. The Labour Government then found that they had to deal with the problems that they had created by introducing a statutory pay policy.

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend. There was a similar experiment in France a few years ago.

Mr. Prescott rose——

Mr. Clarke: I apologise to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East. I promised to give way to him, and I shall do so now, but before he rises I shall ask him whether the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook, (Mr. Hattersley) was consulted about this campaign yesterday, and whether his right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition is involved in this new policy of driving up wage costs in British industry? How does all this fit in with the current attempts to make Labour appear to be a credible alternative Government? It seems to me that the Labour party is not to be trusted either on pay policy or on the trade union front. We are back to policies being advocated that will have a completely destructive effect upon employment in this country.

Mr. Prescott: It may come as a shock to the Paymaster General to learn that these Benches are the Opposition and not the Government. We are debating the Government's Bill. We have heard much rhetoric from the Minister about the number of strikes, but more days have been lost through strikes under this Government than in the five years of Labour Government. The Minister knows that, because he gave that information in a parliamentary reply.

We are discussing 8 million people who are under the poverty wage level, and that is the reality. A Council of Europe convention determines that low pay is two thirds of an industrial wage. I am surprised that the Minister is not aware of that, because we were at the Council of Europe at the same time. That convention determines the poverty level. Yesterday we said that the number of people paid poverty wages had doubled since the Government came to power in 1979. We argued that there was a need for legislation, and the new clause is concerned with that need.

[Mr. Prescott]

This is only an intervention and I cannot take up all the time of the debate but I wish to comment on the Minister's statement that too much money is paid to youngsters and to deal with the 70 per cent. wage level referred to in new clause 1. Is the Minister aware that in hairdressing, 70 per cent. of the adult wage rate would be about £44? Is £44 too much to pay youngsters in 1986?

Mr. Clarke: One interpretation of the Council of Europe's convention produces the figure of 8 million to which the hon. Gentleman referred and to which his policies, set out yesterday, are most especially directed. The figure of 70 per cent. of the wage level, which the Labour party would restore to young people, would produce a comparatively low figure as a legal minimum in some industries. However, in Germany, the proportion of young people's incomes to that of adults is much lower. When people take their first job they have little to offer but enthusiasm and the hope of acquiring skill and experience. They must expect to receive lower pay in relation to adults and in comparison to what they will receive when they have acquired their skills.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East objects to our debating his policies, but, with respect, we are discussing the subject matter of the debate, which is the new clause put forward by the Labour party. The Labour party advocates that we should have a statutory minimum wage level for young people. It is plainly part of the policy —the fair pay policy—which was set out by the hon. Gentleman and by the hon. Member for Ladywood to drive up the pay costs of British industry on a substantial scale. In our opinion, that would sacrifice many jobs.

Our policy is quite straightforward. The earnings taken out of industry by any workers have to be based on the value that the worker can put into that industry. The success of the worker helps his company to succeed in the market place, including the world market place. Higher wages are a desirable objective for most people, but they must come from better performance. Our latest proposal is a concept of profit sharing. This would encourage industry and those working in a particular industry, and thus the rewards are more closely linked to the success or otherwise of the enterprise.

The young person who is trying to take his or her first step in the labour market certainly needs to be protected, and I agree entirely with such protection. In my view, they need to be protected against the risk of being priced out of a job. That is a risk which they would run if the wages councils provision, as advocated in the new clause, was adopted, or a national minimum wage, as canvassed by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East, was adopted.

I ask the House to reject new clause 1 and accept the link between pay and employment. If the Labour party rejects that link, it will be folly in the extreme. The hon. Member for Ladywood tries to refute any link between present employment and pay by citing the figures which she always cites. She argues that since 1979 there has been an increase in youth unemployment. These figures take in the full winds of the recession since 1979, but youth unemployment has not risen by as much as it has in other sections of the population. The fall in earnings of young people vis-à-vis adults has taken place only since about 1982. Ever since young people have followed the policies encouraged by the Government and taken a lower proportion of the adult wage, the percentage of young people unemployed has decreased. The position of young people has improved.

5.15 pm

Between April 1982 and April 1985 the average annual increase of earnings for the under-18s has been 5·7 per cent., while for those aged 18 and over it has been 8 per cent. The number of unemployed under-18s as a proportion of the total unemployed has fallen. In January 1983 it was 6·9 per cent., in January 1984 it was 6·4 per cent., in January 1985 it was 5·9 per cent. and in January 1986 it was 5·5 per cent. I am pleased that the overall unemployment rate for under-18s has fallen.

Mr. Nellist: It is called YTS.

Mr. Clarke: In this period when the earnings of youngsters have gone up more slowly than have earnings for adults, the unemployment rates for under-18s has fallen. In January 1983 the figure was 25·2 per cent., in January 1984 it was 21·3 per cent., in January 1985 it was 20 per cent. and in January 1986 it was 19·1 per cent.

The hon. Member for Ladywood bitterly attacked the young workers scheme, but that has created, on any analysis, 120,000 additional jobs for young people, even allowing for displacement, which of course would in part modify the result. The number of unemployed under-20s has fallen by 63,000 since 1983. That is over 10 per cent. of the total. Youth unemployment is decreasing. The level has come down with the help of the youth training scheme, the young workers scheme and the new workers scheme.

There has been a growing realisation in industry that young people's wages must bear a sensible relationship to adult wages if people are to be given their first job.— [Interruption.] The very mention of youth training always causes excitement. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East and his colleagues must face the experience of the past four years, when unemployment among young people has been falling steadily. They have responded to that by mounting a virulent campaign which is a combination of a weakening commitment to YTS and driving up pay costs. That would drive up youth unemployment. I believe that their campaign is thoroughly misconceived and irresponsible. The irresponsibility is wrapped up in the guise of a low-wage campaign. The Labour party cannot be trusted in this area. The claim that the Labour party has a sensible economic policy is incredible when its employment team is let loose advocating this type of inflationary and anti-job nonsense.

Mr. Nellist: I arrived in this Chamber almost three years ago as one of the youngest Members elected at the election of 1983. I am the youngest Member to be returned to Parliament by the city of Coventry since Coventry has had Members of Parliament. Therefore, it is natural that, over the years, I have spent much of that time defending young workers against the ravages of the Government and their pathological hatred for young people.

I have had special responsibility to champion the hopes and aspirations of millions of young workers in the face of mass youth unemployment. The three months I have spent on the Bill have not changed or disavowed my opinions in one respect. There was an unreal atmosphere about the speech of the Paymaster General. I might hope that it was his last speech, but that would be too much to hope for. In Committee there were many platitudes about how the measures were designed to support and provide jobs for young people. Frankly, nobody outside the Chamber and very few inside it believe that. The Bill is designed to continue the trend of driving down the wages of young people so that the profits of those who financially backed the Tory party at the last general election are suitably enhanced.

What is the real world, away from those platitudes? The real world should interest the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt), in whose constituency I was brought up. Its careers office has a little story in this morning's Daily Star under the headline:

"I gotta job! Joy for girl in 5,000"

It reads:

"Lucky Karen Sanderson has beaten 5,000 other desperate youngsters to get the only job going in the dole capital of mainland Britain.

The Cleveland careers service had only one unfilled vacancy to satisfy 5,278 registered unemployed."

No fewer than 55,000 people are unemployed, and 36 per cent. of them are under 25. The principal careers officer said:

"The day the young girl came in for a job we had only one available. Today we have only eight jobs available for all those thousands of youngsters needing work. We have another 4,000 young people on youth training schemes. But they will be looking for real jobs in a year or two. We know that 65 per cent. of folk coming off YTS projects can't find real jobs."

That is the real world that the Chamber must deal with if it is to have any relevance to the hundreds of thousands of young people who remain unemployed under the present Prime Minister and the Government.

Matters are equally grim in my city of Coventry, where 5,000 more youngsters will leave school this summer. I telephoned our careers office today. We are better off than Cleveland: we have 76 vacancies. That still leaves 4,924 young people without a job. We already have more than 5,000 unemployed young people competing for the same jobs. Among them are young people leaving special schools. They might be mentioned in the debate on new clause 2.

We had a brilliant year in Coventry last year. Of the 189 physically and mentally handicapped youngsters who left special schools, seven found work. Two of them went to sheltered work. That was better than the previous year, when only two found work. What hope will the handicapped youngsters of Coventry have when another 190 leave this summer? It might be suggested that, if the seven who got jobs took a wage cut, there might be an extra one or two jobs for those who leave school this summer. That is economic and political rubbish.

One ward in my constituency has an official male unemployment level of 44·2 per cent. In reality, it is well above 50 per cent. That is the situation in Coventry. There is no future for young people in our city, the midlands or the country as a whole, short of getting a genuine Socialist Labour Government prepared to plan the economy rationally and to guarantee young people jobs.

Under this Prime Minister, half a million young people have never had a job since they left school. Ten years ago, 61 per cent. of 16-year-olds had a job. Only 18 per cent. have a job now. The studies, the projections and the computer models that were wheeled before us in Committee to support abolishing young people's right to a minimum wage could only come up with a prediction that between two and 160 jobs could be created in Coventry, South-East, or between eight and 600 jobs could be created for the whole of Coventry if all the 500,000 young people took a pay cut. So what?

In the month before Christmas, a factory in Coventry —General Electric Company—the chairman of which is the Tory Member of Parliament for Waveney (Mr. Prior), declared 1,000 redundancies, the bulk of them in my constituency. One half of the Tory party is chucking people out of work while the pious hopes of the other half urge young people to take wage cuts to try to create jobs.

No other country has done what the Paymaster General is asking us to do — to denounce the International Labour Organisation convention No. 26 and deny young people the right to a legal minimum wage. His justification is that they should take lower wages to create more jobs —that we should "price young people into jobs". Will that happen? Nye Bevan used to ask, "Why look in the crystal ball when you can read the book?"

Sir J. Hoskins talked about the real aim of the youth training scheme when he was in the Prime Minister's private office. It is on the record. It was to increase the differential between youth and adult wages. That has happened. When the youth opportunities programme allowance was introduced in 1978, youngsters were on £19·50 a week. The YTS equivalent today is £7·30. If it had increased with the retail price index, youngsters would now be on £38 a week, and if the allowance had increased in line with average earnings, they would be on £44 a week. In other words, school leavers have taken a £17 a week pay cut in the past eight years while youth unemployment has trebled.

There is no evidence to support the argument that cutting wages creates jobs. The Minister might assert that there is a link. If there is, why is the highest unemployment not in Sweden and the lowest unemployment not in India? Half a million young people will get pay cuts unless new clause 1 is accepted. That means one in five young people in a job or one in three school leavers in their first job. The average wages of these people is about £50 a week—in hairdressing it is just above £30 a week for a first-year apprentice.

I notice—this is a bit of a constitutional oddity—that the Prince of Wales' consent is needed before the Bill will get Royal Assent. I do not suppose that he has ever had to live on £40 a week. There is a huge disparity between the very rich and the half million young workers in service industries such as hotels, restaurants, catering, clothing and hairdressing. The Government's hypocrisy is revealed by the fact that one day in July they said that young people must price themselves into a job and the next the Prime Minister talked of the need for recruitment, retention, motivation and morale among the 2,000 judges, generals and top civil servants who needed a 40 per cent. increase in their salaries, taking the Cabinet Secretary's salary up by £500 a week.

We cannot take the Bill entirely in isolation. It is part of a process to create a conveyor belt of school leavers, leaving school, doing two years on YTS for artificially depressed training allowances—cheap labour rates—and doing another three years before they reach the maturity accorded to them by the Government at 21, when they will get an adult rate of pay. To ensure compliance, the Department of Health and Social Security has issued circular CS/INF/YTS/7/85, paragraph 18 of which instructs careers officers to inform the DHSS if a youngster refuses to go on a youth training scheme, whereupon they will get a six-week cut in benefit. At least it was six weeks until about 10 days ago when the Secretary of State said that it would be a 13-weeks penalisation.

Next week — perhaps next Monday night — the Secretary of State will introduce a £5·80 cut in the supplementary benefit level for the under-18s. Just to tidy it all up, if youngsters object, or try to organise themselves into a trade union to enhance wages and conditions, they can be dismissed without recourse to an industrial tribunal if they have not worked two years full time or five years part time. That demonstrates the Government's pathological hatred of youth.

The Bill does not tackle the real causes of unemployment. The real cause is the refusal of those who own wealth to invest. That is why production is lower than it was in 1973. Investment has fallen, output has fallen, and we now import more factory-made goods than we export. It is the first time that the workshop of the world has done that for more than 300 years. That is why the gaps between us and other countries which the Minister likes to quote—Germany, America and Japan—have opened.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Nellist: I cannot. I apologise, but the signals are coming and I might be strangled by the Whips if I do not finish soon.

There has been a refusal to invest, so where will the profit come from—by driving down the wages of young people. There is enough money in the country to give everybody a decent wage. If we brought back some of the £70 billion that has gone abroad during the past six years, there would be enough to pay decent wages.

We want to offer a real job to young people. We are not advocating their donning smocks and showing American tourists around the Tower of London, which is what the Tory Government are turning us to in the 1980s. The wages councils were set up 75 years ago. We are trying to give young people a little protection, but I shall vote for the new clause in the Division. The new clause will have more bite if other policies of the Labour party and the Trades Union Congress, such as a national minimum wage of two-thirds average earnings, are implemented.

I shall put that into figures for the Paymaster General. It would require a wage of £120 a week for adult workers. If 70 per cent. of that was offered to young workers, they would be lifted out of the poverty trap. Half a million youngsters would then have a decent rate of pay and 8 million adults would look forward to the future, and be able to afford a holiday, a television, to run a car and other things which are necessities in Britain today.

On 31 May thousands of workers, principally women, will demonstrate, rally and march in Manchester under the banner of the North-West Region Labour Women's Council, demanding a national minimum wage and a mass recruitment campaign to trade unions and the Labour party of young workers who are affected by this provision. I hope that a repeat of such campaigns will signal the death knell of the Tory Government and the low-wage, cheap-labour economy, on which their big business backers depend for their luxury life styles.

It ill behoves the Paymaster General who is on almost £1,000 a week to tell 500,000 hairdressers and other young people who work in hotels, shops, restaurants, catering and clothing establishments that £40 a week is too much for them in Maggie's Britain. I hope that the new clause is passed overwhelmingly tonight.

5.30 pm

Mr. Martin: I wish to speak to new clause 2 and amendment No. 81, both of which are in my name.

The Government propose to take young people out of the protection of the wages councils, but I urge them to reconsider their decision with regard to the physically and mentally handicapped. From my experience as a trade union officer and a councillor serving on the social work committee of the old Glasgow corporation, I know that young people, especially mentally handicapped young people, can be exploited. Some people will say that only a minority of employers will stoop so low, but if it were not for the minority of bad individuals in every respect, the House would not require legislation to protect the community.

I remember having to go to the Inverclyde local authority in Greenock because there was a complaint that some workers were not receiving a proper bonus. I discovered that the complaint was unjustified. The personnel officer had set one section aside for disabled and mentally handicapped workers and ensured that for 52 weeks of the year young people in that gardening section received a guaranteed bonus. During the summer that meant that able-bodied workers received a bigger bonus, which is how the complaint arose.

From conversations with the workers and the personnel officer, I discovered that he was doing a remarkable job. He did not require legislation, but he protected those young workers because he saw a need to do so. One worker could not read, so the personnel officer instructed the head gardener to draw up a plan of colours so that that worker would know the type of flowers to lay in a flower bed. He instructed a charge hand not to allow another worker to operate a motorised lawn mower because he knew that from time to time that worker had epileptic fits. Another worker turned up for work on holidays because he did not understand what holidays were. The personnel officer took it upon himself to phone that young man's parents to tell them that he should not turn up for work on the Queen's birthday and other public holidays. The personnel officer ensured that those workers were well protected, without any prompting.

On the other hand, there is the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968, and I know that social workers are prepared to keep an eye on mentally handicapped workers who were in their care before they reached the age of maturity, which in Scotland is 16. I know of cases in the Strathclyde region where some of those workers are 50 and still receive help from the social work department. Social workers help those people mainly because from time to time cases are reported to them of workers who are being exploited, and who work long hours and are not paid proper wages for hard, heavy work in kitchens, hotels, and, sometimes, circuses. They are respectable people who do not understand their rights.

I could talk all night about the problems that arise with those workers. Surely, if we allow people to work, we should ensure that those who need protection are protected through legislation. We are failing in our duty if people in that category are exploited.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): I am a little confused. The hon. Gentleman is arguing one case, but the amendment seems to imply another. It seeks to remove all disabled workers from part II. At least under part II there is a minimum provision, but the amendment seeks to remove it.

Mr. Martin: I am aware that time is short. I have explained my aims to the Minister, and if he feels that my new clause is defective he can, nevertheless, take my point on board. That is often the case with new clauses and amendments, but hon. Members are entitled to speak to them so that they can explain what they want, and if the Government can support the change it is up to them to ensure that the wording does not have the wrong effect.

The Minister may argue that if we introduce or tighten up legislation it will deter employers from exploiting mentally and physically handicapped people. There must be a balance between ensuring that we find as many young people a job as possible and ensuring that they are not exploited by unscrupulous employers. It should be remembered that employers do not always know what their workers' rights are, let alone that employees know their rights. Legislation should be available to help them when complaints are made.

Mr. Lawler: In stating that I have the honour to be president of the British Youth Council and chairman of the all-party youth affairs group — I stress that I do not speak in that capacity today — I hope that I can prove that I do not have a pathological hatred for young people. On the contrary, one thing that I have in common with the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) is that we are not so far out of that sector of our lives as are some hon. Members. Indeed, I suffer from the delusion sometimes that I am still in it.

One thing that regular contact with young people has taught me is that they have a far more realistic view of their worth and of economic realities than does the Labour party. One needs only to consider the high percentage of those who have expressed satisfaction with the youth training scheme and the opinion polls that have been conducted among young people to see the proof that they are willing to undertake work at sensible and realistic allowances. The Labour party's dogmatic approach will deny them the opportunity to undertake such work.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General said, the Opposition must think we believe that there is some political mileage in being vindictive against young people by driving down wages. No political party would seek to attack the living standards of young people. We are seeking to do the opposite. There is no lower standard of living for a young person than the dole or supplementary benefit. The proposed legislation seeks to improve young people's living standards by giving them jobs. That is the most significant step that they could take.

As my right hon. and learned Friend said, the effect of the new clause would be to increase the wages of 16 and 17-year-olds in industries covered by the wages councils. In the clothing industry it would mean an employer paying £49·49 insted of £46·06. In the retail food sector it would mean an employer paying £56 instead of £50·38. That would mean fewer jobs and a further falling behind in competitiveness at a time when all our major competitors pay a far lower proportion of wages to young people than we do. They pay 20 to 30 per cent. of adult wages, rather than our 60 to 70 per cent.

The new clause would also lessen the opportunities for training and cut the opportunities for young people to advance themselves. If companies must pay so much for young people, they will not spend more to train them. We must ensure that young people are recruited at sensible allowances, so that companies will invest time and money in them and enable then to make a more effective contribution to their employers.

The new clause would block young people's advancement. It is better that young people get on the first rung of the ladder. There is no career on the dole or any benefits structure that they can climb. The only way in which they can advance themselves is by getting their first job. and this legislation opens the door to employment opportunities.

The savings that employers could make by employing young people at more realistic wages could be used in two ways: first, to increase training; and, secondly, to pay more to skilled workers. I agree with the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) that skilled workers in Britain are paid less than those in competitor countries. In Germany workers are paid more because a much higher percentage of them have vocational qualifications and therefore contribute more to their companies and deserve higher wages.

The new clause would hit those who are least qualified and who find it hardest to get jobs. The Labour party is deserting what it has always claimed as its traditional ground and is aiming at the middle-class vote. However, the Conservative party has not forgotten the most disadvantaged and the least fortunate and is giving them an equal chance to prove themselves.

Half a million young people covered by the wages councils are affected by the Bill. Another 500,000 unemployed young people aged under 20 will also be affected because the legislation will give them greater opportunities of employment. Setting a rigid limit such as the clause proposes will not help those in work in the long run, and will harm the chances of those whom we are seeking to help, those who do not have jobs.

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): I commend the speech made by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin). I do not know whether his amendment is in order, but he was arguing a case which deserves some specific and detailed reaction. Whatever the broad merits of this part of the Bill, we would not wish the chronically disabled and mentally retarded to be placed in an abominable position, with not even their intelligence to protect them. The hon. Gentleman advanced a strong argument, and I hope that the Minister will respond to it.

The Government have got the legislation wrong. I do not agree with many of the speeches that have been made by Labour Members, but the abolition of all wage controls for those aged under 21 is unjustified. I represent an area of endemic unemployment, with the lowest wage structure in Britain. I know what happens to wages in industries not covered by wages councils when wage protection is removed. It is not uncommon in areas such as mine for qualified 19 or 20-year-olds, some with four or five O-levels, to be earning £50 to £55 a week. That is what happens when wage protection is removed. Other parts of the country are more fortunate, but that is the logical outcome of the Government's proposals.

However, there is a minute amount of truth in the Government's broad thrust, which says in essence that to pay the adult rate to an 18-year-old in industries covered by wages councils must militate against the employment of other young people. That is true. It might not be popular with young people, and it might not gain any votes to tell them, but I have no doubt that to pay the full adult rate to an 18-year-old, especially in a low-wage area such as mine, militates against their employment prospects. That occurs especially where an employer has an alternative choice of people aged 25 to 30 with skills, some experience and the other qualities acquired with age. They will compete against youngsters.

Many Conservative Members have not faced the problem. I criticise them because they have extrapolated to infinity from the specific, although I recognise it to be a genuine problem. The evidence suggests only a couple of steps, as opposed to the journey from here to the unknown.

The Government should have redefined the adult rate —I call it the experienced rate—to the age of 21. In an odd way, they have done that. They should have maintained some protection for people within those areas, having renegotiated the steps up to the age of 21. In the reply to the debate — it must have been considered because I have argued it in the House several times— the Minister must say why the Government rejected that solution. I have heard no substantial argument to convince me that that would not have been the rational and sensible outcome of the legislation.

Mr. Holt: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that part of the problem lay in previous Governments reducing from 21 to 18 the age at which full national insurance and other contributions were made? A person is an adult either at 18 or at 21. We are now introducing hybridity, which will cause further confusion.

Mr. Penhaligon: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says. I am trying to reflect on the conventions in some of our European partners. In some countries it is not unknown for the adult or experienced rate not to be paid until the age of 23 or 24. In Japan, in some industries, the top or skilled rate is not paid until people are approaching their 30s. I do not accept the argument that as soon as someone if given the franchise, which is rightly given at 18, that automatically coincides with the day on which he has all the skills, experience and other qualities accumulated while earning a living. I should be pleased if the Minister would reflect on that.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short), who opened the debate on the new clause, made a statement which may be right, but which was different from what I originally understood. I am not enthusiastic about the fact that the Government have withdrawn from the International Labour Organisation. I checked with the Library some months ago and was told that, although the Bill removes some minimum wage protection for those under the age of 21, it would still be possible to pass the Bill and to remain inside the ILO convention. That was asserted to me by the Library, and I should like a reply from the Minister. Will it be possible to stay in the ILO with the minimum wage protection which the Bill still gives to some, albeit only those over the age of 21?

I raise this issue because I was worried by the advice that I was given. If the Government could have stayed in, why did they withdraw? I fear that they withdrew, not because of the Bill, but because it will give them the power at some time in the future to introduce in Parliament an order to abolish all wages council restrictions from A to Z which would be debated for about one and a half hours.

Mr. Prescott: That is in the Bill.

Mr. Penhaligon: If that is so, I live and learn.

I am aware that under the Bill as drafted it will be possible for the Government to put before Parliament a proposal to abolish overnight all wages control and wages councils. I am asking whether the Government have withdrawn from the ILO because the possibility of doing that appeals to them, or because the changes provided for in the Bill forced them to withdraw from the ILO. I fear that it is the former, which makes the Government's proposals even less acceptable.

My questions therefore are, first, why can the Government not step up the age to 21, and, secondly, did they have to withdraw from the ILO because of the Bill?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. David Trippier): This has been an interesting and pretty long debate and I have somewhat limited time in which to reply. I wish first to reply to the point raised by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin), who was supported to some extent by the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon).

Ms. Clare Short: I raised the matter also.

Mr. Trippier: Indeed, yes. I appreciate that credit must be shared by Opposition Members, although in fairness I am dealing with what has been said by the hon. Member whose name is appended to the amendment.

It has been quite a problem for all members of the Committee to wrestle with this. The hon. Member for Springburn is aware that there is power under present legislation to award certain permits to disabled people who would not normally be employed by employers on an individual basis, taking each case on its merits in the instance of those people disabled by any form of handicap, mental or physical.

We have gone through a period of consultation in the Department with lobbies representing handicapped people. Since the hon. Gentleman raised the point at the last sitting of the Committee, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham), I have had long discussions with the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley), whose name also is appended to the amendment, and with Brian Rix, the director-general of Mencap. On balance—rather like the TUC, only on balance—they do not think that there should be incorporated on the face of the Bill the legislation that is currently in force by way of a new clause. I say that because I wish to assure the hon. Member for Springburn that I have taken this point seriously both in Committee and today. I am anxious to continue to meet the lobby representing handicapped people to see how we can assist.

In the discussions with Brian Rix, I was interested to know that his members are pleased with the scheme run by the Manpower Services Commission that is known as the sheltered placement scheme. They are anxious to see the Department of Employment develop and strengthen that scheme, which they think has been a success.

I was interested in the comments of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) in opening the debate. As I understand it, she says that this legislation is designed to cut the wages of the country's poorest workers. It is to that that we so strongly object—the fact that the Opposition are wittingly trying to mislead the public, because they talk constantly as if we are scrapping wages councils. Nothing could be further from the truth. We took notice of the consultation exercise, for which we were responsible. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Lawler) said, we passionately believe that by discriminating in favour of the under-21s we will allow them to take that important first step on the employment ladder. The hon. Member for Ladywood and her hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) peddle the propaganda, and always have done, that we are scrapping the lot. We are not.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General and Minister for Employment referred to the new realism that is creeping in. There is no way in which this Government would do anything to harm the young people whom we are anxious to see in employment. That realism is creeping into the TUC. It has not yet hit the Labour party. The document to which I referred in Committee —I sent a copy to the hon. Member for Ladywood— and which was written by senior trade unionists and members of the TUC, said:

"There can be no doubt that a general rise in the level of money incomes which significantly outstripped the rate of growth would be incompatible with achieving our objective of a high wage, high productivity, low unit cost economy, and that means that we can't have it unless we earn it."

That is the point that we have consistently made.

I say again that it is nonsense and ridiculous for the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) to suggest that Conservative Members have a pathological hatred of youth. That was a stupid statement. I suggest that it shows yet again that the Labour party is out of touch with reality.

Mr. Prescott: After listening to the debate, I am not sure whether this is a case of a pathological hatred of youth or the economic illiteracy of those Conservative Members who spoke.

The statement from which the Minister has just quoted and to which the Paymaster General gave a great deal of attention is about productivity, earnings and wages. It is the level of investment in those areas that is crucial. If he looks at the OECD's figures, he will find that Britain is better only than Portugal in its level of investment manufacturing out of the 24 countries, and this is below the level of 1979. The Minister needs to consider what brings about jobs and determines wages, but he has not done so in this case.

The Paymaster General talks about the salaries of young people. Apparently £45 is far too much. I wonder what he did about the barristers' recent claim for an increase in income. I wonder what advice the Paymaster General has given to the new top salaries review that the Government are holding back at present regarding the income recommendations—this, presumably, to be presented to the House after the Bill has been dealt with. From an examination of the Cabinet minutes on these matters, it will be observed that the right hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Prior) rejected this course of action. He would have been ashamed to hear the debate today.

Let us make it clear that we are denouncing our international obligations. We are the only country out of 94 countries to denounce our international obligations. The Labour party will restore those international obligations. We will bring back the fair wages clause and a form of wages councils that guarantee rates. We are against the sweat-shop industries that are becoming a common feature after seven years of this Government. From all the evidence that we have seen of the young workers' scheme with its reduction of wages, no extra jobs have been created.

As to the removal of the fair wages clause, hon. Members should talk to the Barking hospital cleaners. The number of people employed was reduced and the employees worked a lot harder, but they got less pay and fewer holidays. That is what this is about, driving down the wages of the low paid. It is also a question of job substitution; it is skivvy-scheme YTS that will take the place of the adult worker in wages council industries.

In 12 months' time, we will see the results of the policy. Then Labour's policy of a fair wages strategy that we outlined yesterday will be relevant, and will return a Labour Government. Therefore, we will vote for the clause in the belief that it will give a right and just return to young people.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New Clause 3

CLOTHING INDUSTRY

'The Clothing Manufacturing, Retail Bespoke Tailoring, Cap and Millinery and the Made-Up Textiles Wages Councils shall be excluded from the provisions of Part II of the Bill except that the provisions of Clause 22 shall apply.'. — [Mr. Merlyn Rees.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I spoke on Second Reading but not in Committee about my interest in clothing and textiles——

Mr. Holt: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You appear to have called new clause 3, without mentioning the other amendments to be taken with it. Are we simply discussing new clause 3?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): I accept the hon. Gentleman's point. With new clause 3 it will be convenient also to discuss the following: New clause 7—Hotel and catering industry—

'The hotel and catering trades shall be exempted from Part II of the Act and wages councils in these sectors shall retain existing powers.'.

New clause 8—Retailing and distribution—

'The retailing and distribution trades shall be exempted from the provisions of Part II of the Act and wages councils in these sectors shall retain existing powers.'.

Amendment No. 55, in clause 12, page 12, line 4, at beginning insert—

'With the exception of the powers conferred on the clothing manufacturing, retail bespoke tailoring, cap and millinery and the made-up textiles wages councils.'.

Amendment No. 56, in clause 12, page 12, line 4, at beginning insert—

'With the exception of the powers conferred on wages councils setting conditions in the hotel and catering trades.'.

Amendment No. 57, in clause 12, page 12, line 4, at beginning insert—

'With the exception of power conferred on wages councils setting conditions for the retailing and distribution trades.'.

Mr. Rees: My interest in clothing and textiles is not new. For nearly 25 years I have represented an area of South Leeds where clothing was a major industry. The Burtons empire used to have a manufacturing base in Leeds, but that has now gone. Leeds also had the Fifty Shilling Tailors. I am sure that some hon. Members bought their first suits from such firms.

Clothing was a major industry in my area, and my prime motive in moving the new clause, is to alert the Government to the problems faced by Leeds and other textile towns nearby in the north, in the east midlands and in Leicester.

Some months ago I was prompted, in view of the problems facing the clothing and textile industry in relation to the wages councils, to table an early-day motion. It was signed by 186 people. That is not an insignificant number. I stress its main points to the Minister. I believe that it expresses the wider issues which have a bearing on the precise problems about wages councils in the Bill. The motion states:

"That this House, noting the widespread concern within the clothing industry at the Government's Wages Council proposals which would severely affect vulnerable workers, including many employees of small companies, ethnic minority workers, homeworkers and young workers generally"— the motion led me to make a point which the Paymaster General took up on Second Reading when I made a brief intervention—

"further noting the recent report on the industry by the Department of Applied Economics at Cambridge University, which suggested that rather than destroying jobs, wage increases between 1950 and 1980 actually expanded clothing employment, and noting the contribution of the Clothing Manufacturing Wages Council (Great Britain),"—

I notice that we are not dealing with Northern Ireland now—

"the Clothing Manufacturing Wages Councils (Northern Ireland) and the other clothing wages councils to good industrial relations in the industry which is helping to provide conditions under which the advanced sector of the industry can invest so that the United Kingdom clothing industry remains internationally competitive, accordingly calls on the Government to abandon its present proposals to reduce the scope and powers of the clothing wages councils."

That early-day motion did not get anywhere. As well as representing Leeds, South—which is a clothing industry area—I also now represent Morley, which is a textile town. At least, it was a textile town, but it is no longer. Textiles have almost disappeared from it during the past 25 or 30 years and that is not simply the Government's fault. My right hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Harrison), who is present today, also represents a town in west Yorkshire which contains a clothing and textile industry.

New clause 3 deals with

"Retail Bespoke Tailoring, Cap and Millinery and the Made-Up Textiles Wages Councils."

6.15 pm

All these councils are in the same general boat although there are differences of approach between them, a point that I have discovered after examining them and after receiving advice from various sources. I shall concentrate now on clothing and textiles.

I shall first clarify clause 22. New clause 3 provides that clause 22 will remain in the Bill. I would like the Minister to clarify certain points about clause 22 even though that clause was dealt with in Committee. In fact, I believe that clause 22 was not dealt with adequately in Committee. There was no discussion on that clause in Committee and it was agreed to without a Division because it makes a director, manager, secretary or similar officer of a limited company, or a person purporting to act in such a capacity, liable for offences under part II of the Bill if that person consented to the offence or connived in it, or if the offence was due to that person's neglect. The similar provision in the Wages Councils Act 1979—and we are dealing with the 1979 Act now, not the Truck Act 1831—is limited to liability or a failure to return accurately completed questionnaires issued by the wages inspectorate.

Clause 22, as I read it, would give the inspectorate added powers to pursue fly-by-night employers. The clothing industry and its associated industries are not short of fly-by-night employers. I could give examples of the failure of the inspectorate to recover money that they assess is due to clothing workers.

[Mr. Rees]

A report by the factory inspectorate, which the Minister will have access to, on 300 clothing factories published in February 1985 observed:

"There is a higher turnover of employers in the clothing industry than in any other."

I could develop that point. However, we need to have clause 22 in the Bill. It gives extended powers to the inspectorate. However, I wonder whether the powers will be extended. My hon. Friends argued in Committee that the inspectorate now will have extended powers. The Minister did not reply to that argument. Do I understand that, because no reply was made, clause 22 does give extended powers to the inspectorate? I hope that the Minister will clarify that when he replies. From the Committee record, I believe that there are extended powers because the Minister would have contradicted that if it was not true.

Mr. Trippier: If I understand the right hon. Gentleman correctly, he is referring to section 24(6) and (7) of the 1979 legislation. If that is correct, the wording is virtually identical. If not, if he will clarify the matter I shall carry out the necessary research and try to reply to his point in some detail later.

Mr. Rees: It is section 24(6) and (7) of the Wages Councils Act 1979. When the Bill was in Committee, the clause was approved without debate, but when Labour Members referred generally to the extended powers they were not told that they had it wrong and that there are not extended powers. Is that what the Minister is saying?

Mr. Trippier: Yes, but I shall check that.

Mr. Rees: I thank the Minister very much. That is the first point and it shows the worth of a Report stage.

When I spoke during the Second Reading debate there was some badinage, as happens on legislation of this kind, about a report commissioned by the National Union of Tailors and Garment Workers. That was once a powerful union in Leeds, but it is not so powerful any more because there are not nearly as many people in the clothing industry in Leeds. However, it is an efficient union.

On Second Reading I referred to the fact that the research carried out by the department of applied economics at Cambridge showed that when pay goes up as a result of the activities of the wages council, job opportunities are expanded. That may seem extremely strange, particularly in the light of what the Paymaster General said just now. He seems to believe in an over-simplistic scenario on the effect of pay increases. He seems to think that if pay goes up, fewer people will be employed. There may be cases where that happens. That must be the case under certain conditions, but that cannot be the complete story.

The department of Employment's research paper, instituted by the Minister and replied to by the Department of applied economics, concluded that the clothing industry had fallen because of the increase in minimum rates. That was refuted not only by the unions but by the employers.

The independent examination by the department of applied economics in October 1985 countered that argument. The Paymaster General called the report in aid so I feel disposed to develop this argument because it underlines what is implicit in the Bill. The report said that the wrong figures were used in the study. Clothing and footwear figures were used instead of those for clothing. For females the Department's figures for minimum rates were incorrect. For males April minimum rates and October earnings were used instead of figures for rates and earnings in the same month. Foreign competition—we know about that in Leeds—was measured by the ratio of clothing retail prices to clothing wholesale prices. The clothing wholesale prices index was also used to calculate real minimum rates.

The Department assumed that there were always more workers willing to work in the industry for the wages available than employers wanted. That is implicit in what the Paymaster General said today. I do not find that so in my constituency. The Department assumed that employers did not substitute cheaper female labour for male employment. The Department's analysis was inadequate.

To summarise, the view of the department of applied economics was that available statistics show that the industry was short of labour for most of the period, and that the only way to get more labour into the industry was to have higher wages. Secondly, it found that the obvious explanation for the loss of jobs is foreign competition in the form of cheap imports. That is certainly the case in Leeds. I can give the Minister chapter and verse. A firm such as Maenson, formerly May and Sons of the 1860s and 1870s, eventually bought by the GUS empire, was shut down in Leeds when the pound went the wrong way and led to increased foreign competition. Given that background we want the wages councils to be excluded from the provisions of part II in the way that I describe in the new clause.

A problem in the industry arises from the high proportion of young people. Therefore, I want to deal with them. Let us not run away with the idea that young people in the clothing industry are waiting to go to the polytechnic or to Oxford university, or wherever, to read modern greats. The labour market is not a wide market that is equal; it is a series of different markets for different sorts of people.

The majority of young people entering the clothing industry undergo a fairly short period of training. As I understood the Paymaster General earlier, he was talking as though there was five years of intensive training with certificates at the end. From my experience over the past 25 years and the advice that I have been given, training is short. Then people go straight on to incentive schemes. Many of the young people are just as productive and, by the very nature of nimble fingers, more so than workers with long experience in the industry. As incentive workers, they are paid according to output, not age. If they are less productive, they automatically earn less. The Government's proposals would deem young workers not fully productive for five years. Anyone with a knowledge of the clothing industry will know that that is not the case. There is no evidence to support the Government's assertion that the extremely low rates which apply to young workers have restricted the recruitment of young trainees.

Let me deal now with the wider issue of incentive workers and holiday entitlement. The two most serious immediate consequences of part II—this is how I am advised it will affect my area, and, no doubt, other areas where people are involved in the clothing industry—will be the loss of the statutory right to holidays and the loss of the statutory right of incentive workers to be paid the minimum as a fallback rate. The holidays are of particular importance to women workers who often do two jobs, one at home and one at work. Contractual rights to holidays are of great importance in the socio-economic scene.

If one goes by television, the modern novel and the way people write today, one would think that all that Mr. Winston Churchill did in 1908 for sweated workers and people working at home was a thing of the past, but it is not. It is important that the Government realise that the world does not end at the Watford gap. There is still an industrial north. It is not the industrial north that it was, but the Government will keep bringing forward legislation that assumes that everywhere is like Guildford and Dorking, but it is not. There is a different part of the country.

The Government do not understand that some of the old methods and ways of industry still exist. Those of us who represent seats in the north, who live in London during the week and go home at the weekend, realise more than most the two worlds in which we live. The Government, led by the Prime Minister, tend to look at the world as if there had been profound changes and the economic ethos of the north has disappeared. Incentive workers could legally earn less than the minimum rate, which is less than £7 a week. That is why the new clause is justified.

I have not dealt with other wages councils, but it goes without saying that these problems apply to them too. No doubt my hon. Friends will mention them. I assume that we are wasting our time moving new clauses if the aim is to win. But perhaps our words will have some effect on the Minister and his Department. He should look at unfair competition and at the decline in the clothing industry, not only in the past 35 to 40 years, but in the past 10 years. The figures of employment are falling all the time. The industry has great problems. We shall not see again the totals that the clothing industry once had. In some ways, I am glad, because the industry was not perfect. It did not supply the right working conditions. Changes are taking place, but training and higher wages are still needed. The Government have made the mistake of changing the wages council for the clothing industry and others.

Long before I went to live in Leeds, and when I was serving in the RAF during the war, the phrase "gone for a Burton" was used. It meant that someone had had it. I often wondered where it came from. Some people say it, meaning that they have gone for a Burton ale. But I looked up that phrase again today and it is suggested that when aircrew or others trained in Blackpool and were learning morse code, they had to go to a nearby former Burtons shop to do their test. If they failed, they were flunked, and so they had "gone for a Burton".

In Leeds, Burtons has gone for a Burton. It does not produce a thing. Unless the Government help the clothing industry, it will all go for a Burton. The Bill shows a singular lack of understanding of the clothing industry's problems, and I commend the new clause to the House.

Mr. Roger Freeman (Kettering): I listened with great interest to the speech of the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees), as he clearly has great experience and important constituency interests. My constituency of Kettering is in Northamptonshire, in the midlands. There are perhaps 250 or 300 textile employees concentrated in three large firms. I appreciate that the conditions there are probably very different from those in some of the towns and cities that Labour Members may describe.

I have not received any representations about the Bill from the major employers in my constituency, who are in footwear manufacture and the making of leather handbags. However, I have received representations from the clothing industry. I have tried to understand the reason for that difference. Incidentally, I pay tribute to Mrs. Davies, the vice-chairman of the National Union of Tailors and Garment Workers, who has patiently lobbied me for the past six or 12 months. Indeed, she was one of those who yesterday presented a petition in Downing street. For many months, I listened with care and attention to the arguments that she made, not about conditions in my constituency but in the wider national context.

The central fear of some of the industry's employees is that wages for those under the age of 21 will be cut, with the resources being transferred to the owners of companies, and distributed in profits and dividends. They fear that young people will be exploited. Judging by the conversations that I have had in my constituency, I do not believe that to be so, although my constituency may not be typical.

I believe that fear to be misplaced for two reasons. First, profitability in the industry is generally low. We well understand the arguments used in favour of toughening the multi-fibre arrangement and helping to introduce sensible measures of protection for the industry. The Minister has a constituency with substantial footwear interests. Before he became a Minister, he was one of the officers of the all-party Back-Bench footwear committee. He understands the unfair conditions facing the footwear industry, which also face the clothing and textile industries. Employers will not deliberately cut the wages of those working in the industry in order to increase distributed profits, because the profits are simply not there.

Secondly, I have taken the trouble to talk to employers about the effect of reducing national insurance contributions. The evidence is that, with lower employment costs, particularly for those aged under 21, employers are prepared to take on extra labour. Perhaps not many are involved, but that evidence still exists. I assume that the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) spoke for the alliance. I entirely agreed with what he said. He generally supported the argument that, with greater flexibility of wage rates for those aged under 21, on balance, employment prospects would be enhanced. Given last year's Budget, that must be borne out by the evidence.

I agree with the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South about the inspectorate. He got things exactly right, and I hope that the Minister will reply to that point. It is important that the inspectorate should have not only sufficient numbers, but the organisation and determination to make sure that the law is properly enforced.

However, I generally welcome the Bill. I do not agree with the fears expressed by those who support the new clause, and I am prepared to support the Bill as it is.

Mr. Ian Mikardo (Bow and Poplar): You have grouped together, Mr. Deputy Speaker, a new clause that deals with what might broadly be called the needle trades, a new clause that deals with the hotel and catering trades, and a new clause that deals with the retail and distribution trades. It is entirely logical to group them together, as they have much in common. For example, the workers in all three industries are the most vulnerable workers, and those who will suffer most from the Bill's provisions.

Those workers will suffer most partly because they are relatively defenceless. In all three industries there are some large establishments and employers and I shall come to that point later. But all three industries also have many workplaces that employ very few people. Sometimes they employ virtually no one, as the work is done by homeworkers. As few people are employed, they are very difficult to unionise. Moreover, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) pointed out, those working in the industry are often on the move. In all three trades, the turnover of labour is much faster than in, say, the engineering industry. Thus, the workers are not unionised. They are vulnerable and low paid, and work in small establishments that are rarely visited by an inspector, so the employer can get away with almost anything. I shall not weary the House with instances, but many of those quoted in Committee involved serious abuse of workers.

I smiled to myself when I heard the speech of the Paymaster General, which was based on the assumption that there is a free bargain between employers and workers in a country with 4 million unemployed. Of course there is not a free bargain. The Government say that there can be recourse to an industrial tribunal, but that does not mean much, because in the sweatshops in east London an employer can break the law because he knows that a worker will not go to a tribunal in case he is sacked.

Anyway, not all workers have that recourse. The so-called safeguards about which Ministers keep talking do not exist; hence the vulnerability of those three industries.

I want to say a word about each of the three industries to ensure that they are properly covered. My right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South spoke about great factories like Burtons. There were a few of those in east London—Simpsons, Polikoffs, and so on. However, the overwhelming majority of the needle trade in London is in small sweatshops run in exactly the same way and often in exactly the same premises as at the turn of the century. My father worked in them before this century began. There are the same sweatshop conditions now as at the beginning of the century; history is repeating itself. There is no protection for the workers.

My right hon. Friend asked why we did not have a great discussion in Committee about clause 22 to determine whether it provided extended powers for the inspectorate. It does not matter tuppence whether the clause does or does not give extended powers to the inspectorate because the inspectorate is vanishing and is almost out of existence. It is hideously understaffed, hideously overworked and hideously inadequate. Some establishments in my constituency have been in operation for 12 years but have not had an inspector across the front door. That is how frequently the inspector visits. Yet, simultaneous with the passage of the Bill, the Government are cutting the number of inspectors. In future, inspection will be much less frequent and much more perfunctory—and it is pretty perfunctory now in many cases.

Inspectors investigate whether proper wage rates are being paid by looking at the wages book. They assume that workers receive the amounts written in the wages book. I can tell the House, from first-hand experience, that that assumption is not universally valid. I suppose that it is valid in the majority of cases, but not in all. In the sort of cases that I have been describing, the only way to find out what Joe or Suzy Bloggs is being paid is to ask them. Sometimes the answer is very different from what is written in the wages book.

My next concern is about the welfare and catering trades. I accept that there are still one-man or two-man cafés, but during the past 10 or 20 years there has been a huge concentration with the establishment of hotel chains —one has swallowed up another and then a third and a fourth. There has also been the growth of huge fast food chains — the Wimpys, McDonalds, Kentuckys, Pizza Huts and so on. Those chains are hugely profitable; the employers are making enormous profits. Because of the enormous profits, shares in some of the public companies have appreciated hugely during the past few years, and virtually all of them on sweated rates of pay. The huge profits and huge capital gains made by shareholders have been achieved by workers being paid the absolute minimum.

The Government do not mind that happening because many of those companies donate some of their profits to Conservative party funds——

Mr. Trippier: No.

6.45 pm

Mr. Mikardo: Oh yes. If the Minister doubts that, I am prepared to send him a list of companies. If he challenges me, I will get my list and quote it at length later. That might prevent the Minister from making any more speeches, because it is a very long list.

In the retail distribution industry there has been considerable concentration with the growth of supermarkets and other specialised chains such as the carpet and DIY chains. There is constant pressure not only to hold down wages, but to lower them. In an earlier debate the Paymaster General spoke about a drive to increase wages. He could not have been talking about this Bill because its purpose is to decrease wages.

In all the three groups I have mentioned there are vulnerable workers who will be abused even more than they are now. Although the three groups appear to be different each from the other, there is a common case for all of them, which is why it was sensible to group them. It is an overwhelming case for the exclusion of each of the three industries from the Bill. I shall therefore support the new clause in the Lobby.

Mr. Holt: Part II of the Bill is the part on which I should support the Government much more fully than I did on part I, but I hesitate to do so because I think that, as with part I, they do not have it quite right. The Government have not abolished all wages councils, and they should either have done so or left them alone. To tinker with them is the worst of all worlds.

If the Government had read the evidence given to the Institute of Personnel Management when it surveyed all sectors of industry and commerce on that issue, they swould have seen very few friends for wages councils. They are not liked by either side — employer or employee. Indeed, the evidence shows that seven or eight years ago the TUC was in favour of their abolition, and we can understand why. The industries with the lowest paid workers are those that come within the wages councils; by definition, wages councils tend to depress wage rates. There are no wages councils for many of our major industries, and if there were none at all the natural process of market forces would operate. However, we have now an unnatural aspect of market forces introduced by wages councils on a set of criteria that are in themselves often meaningless.

The members of wages councils make decisions without having the responsibility of carrying them out. They do not have to find the money to pay the wages that they set, and they can deliberately opt for a low wage settlement to avoid the hassle that accompanies protracted negotiations. Neither side of industry is done any favours by having wages councils.

The hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) observed that there is not strong trade unionism in the wages councils sector. That was part of the TUC argument. If the wages council umbrella were removed, the opportunity and the impetus of the unorganised to become members of trade unions and to be organised would be greater. One of the major reasons why workers in the wages council sector do not join trade unions is that they take the view that they are covered by the councils and that the wages set by these arbitrary bodies is, by and large, what they will receive. By definition, the councils keep workers at the lower end of the pay scale and do not provide a free opportunity for both sides of industry properly to negotiate for a set of wages, terms and conditions similar to that which exists in other industries.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): The hon. Gentleman is wrong in two respects. First, previous TUC opposition to wages councils was formulated at a time when we did not have 4·5 million unemployed. Secondly, workers in the areas and industries covered by wages councils have employers who would sack them if they joined a trade union. That is why there have been so many disputes. The employers say, "If you join a trade union, you will go out of the door. There are plenty more people to take your job if you want to go."

Mr. Holt: I understand the hon. Gentleman's first argument as it is one that appears in the report produced by those who subscribe to the Institute of Personnel Management. It is said in that report that the attitudes of the various sides of industry depend very much on the moment when wages councils are discussed.

Are wages councils now what was intended by the late Sir Winston Churchill in 1908? Are conditions now exactly what they were then? I submit that conditions are very different in one strategic sense. In 1908, there was no television and no mass media of the sort that we have now. There were not the communications that are available to us. The underlying theme of 1908 no longer applies. I cannot understand why the Labour party is arguing so vociferously in favour of wages councils when they have not improved the conditions of the workers whom they cover and have covered over the years when comparisons are made with other industries. That is why I think that the Government are making a mistake even to have the minimum clause that is now to be found in the Bill.

We know that the majority of those who are members of wages councils—we went through this in fine detail in Committee — have never worked in industry or commerce. Three quarters of them have come from academic or legal backgrounds, yet they have been appointed to make wages council decisions and orders. The members of the councils have not come up through the trade union movement.

Mr. Tom Torney (Bradford, South): I have a list of members of the retail food trades wages council, and it is clear that the hon. Gentleman does not understand how wages councils are formulated. Their membership is not restricted to university professors or academics. Trade union officials and trade union members sit on wages councils, as do representatives of employers. They try to thrash out a settlement. I appreciate that there are appointed members, and the side that can draw the support of the appointed members wins the day. The order of the retail food trades wages council is a much better one than that which existed before I came to the House 16 years ago, and that has been achieved by trade union representation.

Mr. Holt: I accept that the hon. Gentleman has strong feelings on this issue. However, one of the arguments set out in the consultative document is that the councils have the very tendency which he demonstrated, which is that of the pendulum effect. They swing one way one year and the other way the next. It might be correct and proper if they were to swing one way for several years. As there is a balance on the councils, the members of them are always looking over their shoulders to ensure that they are not criticised by anyone. At the same time, they are not devoting their attention to the industries for which they are responsible. Instead, they are considering the actions and orders of other councils. In effect, they are equating within a narrow band. If there were no wages councils and if rates of pay were not set artificially for the industries that they now cover, without consideration being given to whether companies can pay more or less, the workers could be better off.

The Government's argument is that the changes that are set out in the Bill will increase the number of employees. They argued a couple of years ago that by changing the qualifying period for a case to be taken to an industrial tribunal they would similarly increase the number in employment. I have not seen the evidence of that yet in my constituency. The Government were warned, but they did not listen.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is being very general in his comments. He should relate his remarks more to the amendments and the new clause.

Mr. Holt: I had referred to wages councils throughout, Mr. Deputy Speaker, until the last passage before you intervened.

Unlike the hon. Member for Bow and Popular, I am sorry that the amendments have been grouped together. If they had remained separate, we could have had three separate debates and could have argued the merits and demerits of the individual industries. One of the bad features of national legislation is that it always brings everything down to a common level. The amendments will do nothing for the workers in the industries to which they relate other than to maintain the status quo in a weakened form.

I am sorry that the Government have not abolished the wages councils. If their abolition proved to be unsuccessful, they could be brought back at a later date. Until they are abolished and we go through a period when they do not exist, we shall not know whether we would be better without them. We are to have the worst of both worlds, as we shall have a weakening of the existing system and a half-baked, one-line minimum which in reality will not mean a great deal to those who are covered by the wages councils in the industries to which the amendments relate.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): The hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) is living in another world. He does not seem to realise that in the clothing, catering, hotel and retail industries, to which wages council orders apply, workers are disadvantaged and unprotected. They are not members of unions because, on the whole, they are part-timers and/or women employees who do not join unions as readily as men. They are frightened that if they join a union they will lose their jobs, even if they are not especially good ones.

I am dealing with a firm in my constituency—I do not want to name it because negotiations are taking place—from which a group of workers came to my surgery seeking my advice. The members of the group told me that the company does not like unions and added, "If we join a union, we are afraid that we shall lose our jobs. We have mortgages and families. Our jobs are not brilliant, but at least they are jobs." They showed me how they were protected by their contracts of employment. They were notified of a change of contract. The reason given for the change was "management decision". In other words, the days of Attila the Hun have not gone from the factories of Leicester.

In its own way, the clothing industry in Leicester has performed a miracle in staying alive. I salute the resilience of the work force and some of the managements which, through their efforts, have kept the industry alive. However, all that is left is the remains of a great industry. I remember my father saying in the House that Leicester would never be hit by a recession and that it got through the last one because people cannot do without shoes, clothing, hosiery and knitwear. Father was right about many things, including most of his criticisms of his son, but he was wrong about that. The effects of the recession and of unlimited imports have kept people in the clothing industry at the lowest wage level and have put many of them out of work.

The Government did not abolish the wages councils, as the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) would have wished, out of any sense of kindness or compassion, but because many of their supporters in the industries recognised that abolishing wages councils and their orders would invite the cowboys in the industries to undercut them by paying even less then they had to pay under the minimum rates of the wages councils orders. That is why the Government did not get rid of the wages councils. That is why the Government are only prepared to get rid of them in stages. That is why we have had the emasculation of the system rather than its total abolition.

Leicester used to be the second most prosperous city in Europe. Today, unemployment in Leicester is rife. Unemployment in the hosiery industry in my constituency is as high as 60 per cent. The Government have the odd idea that, if they cut wages further and allow employers in the textile hosiery and retail industries to pay sweatshop wages without conditions, there will be more jobs. They think that employers will be prepared to take on more people if those whom they employ are sweated labour. Labour Members are against sweated labour. We believe that the wages councils regulations provide about the only protection there is against it, especially in periods of high unemployment.

The Leicester Mercury, Leicester's local newspaper, performed a public service by revealing the sweatshop conditions that exist. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) said with his usual eloquence, the conditions are made much worse by cutting the strength of the factory safety inspectorate.

The number of sweatshops is growing and the cowboys are moving in. Homeworkers are exploited. The Government, in their pursuit of more jobs, are removing the rights of people who have jobs. That is no way to create employment. As the hon. Member for Langbaurgh said, in connection with another matter when he was stopped by the Chair, that will not work. There has been no improvement in employment because the Government's policy has taken away the rights of those at work. There will be no improvement in employment because the Government are seeking the destruction of the wages councils, if not by a direct route, then by an indirect one.

I support the clause proposed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) because it would remove from the legislation the clothing and textiles industry, which is in deep recession, and would give some hope to the people who work in it that hon. Members understand, as the hon. Member for Langbaurgh does not, the problems under which they so ceaselessly labour.

Mr. Tony Banks: New clause 7 states:

"The hotel and catering trades shall be exempted from Part II of the Act and wages councils in these sectors shall retain existing powers."

I am a sponsored member of the Transport and General Workers' Union. Some members of the union will be covered by new clause 7. The hotel and catering sector is the second largest sector covered by wages council protection. Three separate wages councils cover workers in pubs, clubs, licensed hotels, restaurants, cafes and snack bars.

It seems appropriate that the House, the home of the free lunch, should take considerable interest in the conditions that workers experience in the hotel and catering sector. I hope that when hon. Members next enjoy the benefits of a lunch or dinner in one of London's restaurants or hotels, they will think for a moment about the wages and conditions which the workers who have prepared the food, those who have served it, and those who wash up afterwards, must endure. In common with other wages council industries, poor conditions, low pay and poor prospects combine to produce high labour turnover, even in times of high unemployment, in the hotel and catering industry.

Union membership in the industry stands at just 6 per cent. of the national work force. Collective bargaining is confined to workers in a few large hotels and chains. The majority of workers rely directly on the wages councils to protect their wages and conditions. That is the answer to the comments of the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt). Workers in that sector do not join trade unions because, if they do, they will be straight out of the door. The industries rely on high turnoyer and the threat of unemployment, which scare people from joining trade unions.

Although we could, no doubt, find some common ground in saying that there are defects in wages councils, Labour Members accept wages councils now because at least they provide minimal protection for the workers who most desperately need protection. I am looking to the next Labour Government to take a completely different attitude to the protection of workers in the hotel and catering sector. Labour Members have clearly demonstrated that the industry has changed dramatically because of the fast food chains and the importation of American systems.

Mr. Holt: The hon. Gentleman has not participated in the debate up until now. Perhaps he missed the important statement from the Labour Front Bench about what will happen if the Labour Party wins the next general election. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) said that a Labour Government would bring in a national minimum wage. Therefore, the wages councils would be null and void.

Mr. Banks: That does not necessarily follow. I was merely pointing out that, for the moment, we support a wages council system, because at least it provides some minimal level of protection. My right hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) said that the Government have not introduced the legislation to force wages up; they have introduced it to force wages down. It is quite remarkable that the Government's philosophy seems to be that the poor should suffer more poverty as a way of inspiring them to greater effort, but the rich should have greater wealth to inspire them. I have not heard of many judges, admirals, generals, consultants, or even politicians, pricing themselves out of jobs, as they take their large wage increases given by central Government. However, in the catering and hotel industry, where wages and conditions are already appalling, the Government want to take away the minimal protection that workers have. That is why I urge the House to support new clause 7.

Mr. Trippier: I am anxious to deal with many of the points raised by the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees). Although I shall try to cover some of the points made by other hon. Members, I am sure that the House will understand if I concentrate on the right hon. Gentleman's points, which were specific. The right hon. Gentleman and I share the experience of not having to change money at Watford. Those of us who come from and represent constituencies in the north are aware of what life is like there.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) represents a textile and footwear constituency and I know that much of what the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South said was accurate. It was not conjecture or hypothesis. I agreed with many of his points. On many occasions, there has been all-party support on matters concerning the textile lobby—for example, on renewals of multi-fibre arrangements. Many hon. Members have joined forces, as I did when I was a Back Bencher, to lobby Ministers. There is no difference among us in that respect.

As I tried to point out in Committee, our differences on this issue are political and, to a great degree, psychological, in that one either accepts what the Government are saying—that those under 21 will be discriminated in favour of as a result of being taken out of the purview of the wages councils—or one does not. I am not trying to put this bluntly; I am simply saying that one either accepts that view or one does not. We touched on this aspect in the debate on the last series of amendments. No Government in their right mind would go out of their way to do any harm to people under 21. We believe that, as a result of this legislation, we shall increase employment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kettering put it well. He has experience in a constituency similar to mine of what is going on in industries which employ people who, by any standards, could be said to be low paid. Because we share that experience, we know what it is like.

As I said, the intention of clause 22 was to use the precise wording in the 1979 legislation in this legislation. I spent some time considering this aspect and took the advice of lawyers in the Department. I am not satisfied that my initial intervention during the speech of the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South was correct. I think that he has a point. There are wider powers in the Bill. If that is correct, I am sure that he will be pleased, and I am certainly not sorry about that. I hope that we agree.

Mr. Merlyn Rees: Would it not be a good idea for the hon. Gentleman—I do not want to develop this point now—to help us by advising us on the extent to which the powers have been extended?

Mr. Trippier: I am happy to do that. I am under an obligation to the right hon. Gentleman to make that commitment.

Of the Opposition's contributions, the point with which I disagreed most was made by the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo). That is a pity, because I have great respect for him. We had many exchanges in Committee. The hon. Gentleman implied, as did some of his hon. Friends — it was unique — that the Bill's intention was to drive wages down. That is not true. Labour Members could argue that that could have happened if the Government had gone down the route of total abolition advocated by my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt), but we did not.

I carefully followed the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh. Today, he developed his argument in a way that differed slightly from his approach in Committee. One would have to be foolish to disagree with him when he says that the wages council system does not appear to have worked. That is not open to conjecture or hypothesis. It is a fact. This Government or any Government would face a dilemma in considering whether they should go for complete abolition or whether they should try to remove youngsters under 21 from the purview of the legislation. Contrary to the comments of the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner), no subterfuge is involved in the Government's intention to keep protection just for those over 21. We were convinced, following the consultation exercise, that protection for adult workers had to remain.

I am sure that hon. Members listened carefully to my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh. If we scrapped the whole of the wages council system, as he suggested, we would be taking an incredible risk. Labour Members would never be prepared to take such a risk and, on this occasion, I agree with them. It would be too big a risk.

I return to the point that I made to the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South. One either believes that we are helping youngsters under 21 to obtain jobs and to take that essential first step on the employment ladder, or one does not. We can argue for hours on this subject. Indeed, I suggest that we have already done so in Committee. We are talking about not a slight division but a massive chasm between us. It does not please me to say to the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South that we are talking about a massive divide, but we believe that we are right and that the evidence is that youth employment will increase as a result of the legislation.

We accept—I do not think that any hon. Member mentioned this—that there will be some displacement, and it would be silly to deny that. We have always acknowledged that there would be some displacement, but believe that, on balance, there will be an increase in employment among those under 21 in the wages council industries.

Despite the comments of the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South on clause 22 and his incorporation in the proposed new clause of the provisions of clause 22, I am afraid that, because I do not believe that we can operate two different types of wages council systems, I have to ask the House to reject the new clause.

Question put and negatived.

SUNDAY WORKING

'Notwithstanding whatever other determinations a wages council may make in respect of remuneration, the council shall fix a premium hourly rate of remuneration in respect of time worked by a worker on a Sunday.'.—[Ms. Clare Short.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Torney: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member cannot move the motion, because he has not tabled the new clause. The motion can be moved formally.

Ms. Clare Short: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Torney: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I apologise.

I must first declare an interest. I am sponsored by the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers. I must say in passing that I was astounded at the apparent lack of knowledge of some Conservative Members about the way in which wages council orders work and how they tick. I should be happy to explain how they work to the appropriate Conservative group. I am sure that I can do that because I served for many years as a full-time officer of my union.

The Government must surely know to their cost that Sunday is special. Despite the Conservative party's huge majority in the House, it was defeated recently on the Shops Bill. That is proof, if ever it were needed, that Sunday is special. The Government's defeat was evidence of the fact that right hon. and hon. Members thought that Sunday was special. Tory Members contributed in no mean way to the Government's defeat. Sunday is as important a part of the Wages Bill as it is of the Shops Bill. The Wages Bill encroaches on our Sunday just as much as the Shops Bill would have done. Conservative Members cannot have double standards. They defeated their Government then; they should defeat them again.

It has long been established that if a worker is called upon to work on a day that is not a working day, but is a holiday or, as in the case we are discussing, the Sabbath, premium payments should be made. The wages council orders have made it obligatory for such payments to be made by employers to workers called upon to work on the day I described.

Sunday for most people is a day of relaxation. Relaxation is taken in many different ways. Some people favour amateur sports activities, and others may simply wish to rest, perhaps after a hard week's work. Certainly Sunday is a family day when all can be joined in the true spirit of family life and it is also a day for friends. We should never take action which would prevent people from following their democratic right to attend a place of worship. The employer who asks a worker to give up his freedom on a Sunday should be compelled to pay dearly. It is not just a question of workers wishing to increase their earnings. We should make it as expensive as possible for an employer to call upon his employees to work on a Sunday to deter employers from using workers in that way.

Wages council orders were introduced to give protection to workers in depressed industries such as retail distribution, catering and other industries mentioned in the previous debate by many hon. Members, where, through lack of trade union organisation, the workers were unable to seek protection in any other way. In my youth I worked in a shop and I know from experience that without the meagre protection provided by the wages councils I would have been expected to work all hours and all days, including Sundays, for a mere pittance paid weekly.

The introduction of wages councils, while not giving the best conditions to workers in depressed industries, at least provided a basis for better conditions. Wages councils also gave a measure of protection to those workers who were better organised in their trade unions and enabled them to secure better conditions for trade union members.

Wages councils were hailed by the better employers because they had to sell their wares in the same market as bad employers and, therefore, were subject to unfair competition from those bad employers who would not hesitate to exploit workers and force them to work on Sundays without extra payment. Let us not delude ourselves: there are plenty of employers today, certainly in retail distribution which I know so well, who will work their employees on a Sunday without premium payment and will ask them to work unsocial hours if the Bill is passed in its present form.

The Government are not a caring Government. They care for profits, not people. That is shown by the Shops Bill which would have compelled people to work on Sundays. The Shops Bill provided no protection for the conscience of workers and, coupled with the abolition of wages councils and Sunday premiums, would have provided no protection for workers. The Shops Bill would have been aided and abetted by a Wages Bill designed to give greater opportunity for private profit while reducing the standard of life of workers in the lowest paid sections of industry, which includes all forms of retail distribution and catering. We must add to that the mass unemployment and the Government's attacks on the trade union movement which are all designed to create a low-wage, high-profit economy. Therefore, I ask the Government to withdraw the Bill or hon. Members to defeat it when it is put to the vote.

Mr. Trippier: It may be that the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Torney) was not present two hours ago when I referred to a booklet written by the Trades Union Congress. It sets out the TUC's views, which are in direct contrast to those of the hon. Gentleman. I shall send the hon. Gentleman a copy of the booklet because he will find that the TUC was not in agreement with the latter part of his speech.

Mr. Torney: Which part?

Mr. Trippier: I am somewhat short of time and I do not want to repeat what I have already said to hon. Members who have been here for all of the debate. I think that that is a fair point. I shall certainly write to the hon. Gentleman.

If new clause 4 and amendments Nos. 60, 61 and 62 to clause 14 were to be accepted, they would give wages councils additional powers which the Government cannot accept.

Under the Bill, the powers of councils are limited to fixing a minimum hourly rate for basic hours and a minimum hourly overtime rate for time worked in excess of the basic hours. If a worker works on a Sunday and that time is in excess of the basic hours laid down by the wages council, the worker will be entitled to the minimum hourly overtime rate for all time worked on that Sunday. The Government strongly believe that the role of wages councils should be restricted to providing only basic protection and that other matters, including holiday payments and differential rates, should be left to be agreed between employers and workers.

There was almost universal support among employers responding to the consultation exercise for the view that the system had to be drastically simplified if it were to remain. We really cannot continue to put businesses in a straitjacket in which they are prevented from negotiating, as freely as possible, the terms and conditions of employment they can afford.

If new clause 4 and the amendments were carried, they would undo one of the prime objectives of the Bill—that of releasing employers from unnecessary burdens and enabling them to give more time to running their businesses.

New clause 5 would enshrine in statute the existing rights of 2·7 million workers in wages council trades. The House will wish to know that many of the arguments advanced by the Opposition in support of this proposal were debated at length in Committee. I am happy to restate the Government's case.

Part II of the Bill is about deregulation and simplification. Wages councils have been able to fix a wide range of terms and conditions. That has had the effect of putting employers in the legal straitjacket I referred to earlier, which has made it all but impossible for them to negotiate with their workers in a way that is more closely tailored to the needs of the business. The majority of employer responses to the consultation exercises were clearly in favour of radical reform if the wages council system were to be retained.

The House will wish to be aware that workers currently employed under a contract incorporating any or all of the terms of existing wages orders can expect their employment to continue on that basis unless the terms of their contract are changed. A contract cannot be changed unilaterally, but either party may seek at any time to change the terms of the contract by agreement.

If an employer seeks to change the terms of a worker's contract and the worker is unwilling to accept the new terms, he can sue in a civil court for breach of contract, whether or not his employment has terminated. As a separate right, the worker can, if he wishes, seek compensation through an industrial tribunal on the ground that he has been constructively dismissed, provided he has at least two years' service. It will be for the tribunal to decide whether the change in contractual terms is sufficient in law to amount to constructive dismissal. These are substantial protections, as the House will recognise.

Part II of the Bill is a balanced measure. It will prevent the detailed prescription of a multiplicity of terms and conditions which are more properly for agreement between employer and worker. At the same time, it preserves the essential core of the system by providing basic protection. The amendments are wholly incompatible with the Government's objectives, and I ask the House to reject them.

7.30 pm

Ms. Clare Short: The lack of interest in new clause 4 shows an extreme case of double standards. There was a major revolt in the Conservative party on Sunday trading, when we were told that there was deep concern to keep Sunday special because of people's Christian commitments or humanitarian concern for the family, so the Bill was defeated and the Government were forced to withdraw it. Today, the new clause attempts to minimise the requirement for shopworkers to work on a Sunday, and no one is interested.

We all agree that some people must work on a Sunday, but most of us think that Sunday work is unfortunate and should be minimised. Anyone who is asked to work on a Sunday should be rewarded accordingly. At the moment shop workers, for example, get double time if they have to work on a Sunday. That makes the work expensive and means that employers are less likely to demand it. The power to set a premium for Sunday work is being abolished by the Government, which exposes a lack of concern for shop workers and others working on a Sunday. That shows the hypocrisy in the Tory party's stand on Sunday trading. We believe that the power to set a special rate for Sunday should be restored to wages councils so that all workers are not too readily required to work on a Sunday and are adequately rewarded if they are so required.

New clause 5 is also important. It says that those currently employed by wages council industries should not have their conditions of work reduced. The Minister talked about their contract of employment and certain conditions that they might have under their contract, but surely anyone working in a wages council industry has as an implied term of his contract the right to the protection of the conditions that are laid down in the wages council orders. That includes overtime, differential and premium rates, holiday pay and holiday entitlement. Suddenly, by legislation, the Government are weakening the workers' contracts, and the protection that they have.

It is perhaps widely understood that young people will suffer as a consequence of part II, but it is less well understood that adult workers in wages council industries will suffer gravely. No longer will there be provision for holiday pay or holiday entitlement, or premium payments for night work, Sunday or Saturday work, and so on. No longer will there be differentials for skill. There is concern among employers that that will lead to less training and more poaching, and that they will not be able to hold skilled workers. All that is to be wiped away by the Government in their dogmatic adherence to deregulation, as they call it, but we know that it is all about reducing workers' wages.

Amendments Nos. 60, 61 and 62 attempt to give back to wages councils the power to fix premium rates for Sundays, differential rates and holiday pay. The power would not have to be used by the wages council. Why do the Government not allow wages councils to fix those rates if they think they are beneficial to their industries? The Government talk about freedom of choice and freedom for employers and workers to regulate conditions in their own industries as they see fit. We say that the Government do not mean that. If they did, they would leave to the wages councils the power to fix conditions which they thought best for their own industries. Instead, the Government are wiping away those powers and thus reducing the conditions of work for the poorest workers in the wages council industries.

Schedule 2

Constitution etc. of Wages Councils

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move amendment No. 59, in page 32, line 4 at end insert—

'(1A) Unless it appears to the Secretary of State to be inappropriate in all the circumstances for this sub-paragraph to apply to the wages council—

(a) the employers' association nominated by him for the purposes of sub-paragraph (1)(a), or

(b) where two or more employers' associations are so nominated, at least one of those associations, shall be an employers' association appearing to him to be representative of small businesses within the scope of operation of the wages council.'.

In Committee my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) tabled an amendment to schedule 2 designed to ensure that the voice of small businesses had a chance to be heard when important decisions affecting their prosperity, and even their survival in some instances, were being discussed in their wages council. My hon. Friend withdrew his amendment on the understanding that we would table another with the correct technical wording to cover the point that he made. The hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) was very supportive of the amendment.

As the Secretary of State does not normally appoint employers' or workers' representatives himself — it would not be appropriate for him to do so in most cases —the way in which to secure the result intended is to ensure that at least one of the associations that he nominates to appoint employers' representatives on the council is truly representative of small firms.

The amendment is without prejudice to the fact that on many councils there are already representatives of associations which claim to represent small businesses or to represent both large and small businesses—some do both. My hon. Friend's point was extremely well made and accepted by the vast majority of, if not all, members of the Committee. I undertook to table another amendment, and that is the reason for the amendment. I hope that the House will accept it.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): On behalf of Conservative Members, I thank my hon. Friend for fulfilling the undertaking that he gave in Committee. My amendment commended itself across the Committee. I was grateful for the support that I received, especially from the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo).

My hon. Friend the Minister took away my amendment, and I notice that his amendment expresses the effect of my amendment in about 50 words, whereas I struggled to contain it within only eight. However, it would be wrong to carp at this stage of the proceedings.

This is a small but important point. The amendment means that from now on small businesses will have a watchdog on each wages council, able to speak directly to the heart of Government on the way in which wages councils and their orders operate. This applies not just to the larger companies that are covered by wages council legislation, but to the very small—the one-man or two-man family business. I am particularly pleased with this provision.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 14

Wages orders

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move amendment No. 63, in page 14, leave out lines 10 to 12 insert—

'(1A) Any such order may—

(a) make different provision under subsection (1) in relation to periods of time beginning with different dates;

(b) provide for any matter fixed by the order in pursuance of that subsection to have effect only as from a date later than that on which the order comes into force;

but no such order shall provide for a limit fixed in pursuance of paragraph (c) of that subsection to have effect at a time when no rate or rates fixed in pursuance of paragraph (a) or (b) of that subsection will have effect under the order.'.

This is essentially a technical amendment designed to remove a possible doubt that arises in the wording of the Bill as to whether wages councils will be able to continue to provide, within the space of one wages order, for staged increases in minima or reductions in the point at which the overtime rate becomes payable. As hon. Members may know, under past legislation the councils are free to stage increases if they so wish. It is not an everyday occurrence, but there are times in negotiations when both workers' and employers' sides are glad to make use of it.

It was never our intention that the reference in the new legislation to single rates should remove that flexibility from future negotiations and make it necessary for councils to meet all over again, issue new proposals and make new orders just because they wish an uplift in one particular item to be staged rather than implemented all at once. It seems that they may have to go through that laborious, expensive procedure if we do not make this minor adjustment to the Bill. I am sure that negotiators on both sides would be disturbed if they found, on enactment of the Bill, that we had inadvertently imposed the extra burden of additional meetings upon them.

I ask the House to accept the desirability of the amendment in the interests of retaining the present flexibility for negotiators on both sides.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move amendment No. 64, in page 14, line 36, leave out from 'In' to 'as' in line 37 and insert

'this Part any reference, in relation to a time worker, to time worked by that worker shall be construed'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 65 to 74.

Mr. Trippier: All the amendments in this group are for the purpose of clarifying the Bill and safeguarding workers' rights. Clause 14 requires any reference to time worked by a time worker in subsections (1) and (3) to be treated as including a reference to waiting time, which is time during which a worker is required by his employer to be available at his place or work and waiting for work to be given to him to perform, but where no work is available. The need for such a provision is self-evident.

Amendment No. 64 clarifies and strengthens the "waiting time" provision by making it clear beyond doubt that any reference in part II—not just in subsections (1) and (3) of clause 14—to time worked by a time worker shall be construed as including a reference to time during which he is required, whether in accordance with his contract or otherwise, to be available for work and is so available at his place of work.

This is a small but important additional safeguard which I commend to the House as being necessary to avoid any possibility that could result in workers somehow not being entitled to payment for "waiting time".

The intention behind amendments Nos. 65 to 74 can be simply explained. The amendment to subsection 1(3) is designed to make it absolutely clear that the offence of failing to pay not less than the statutory minimum requirement is normally tied to a particular week. This effect may well be achieved because, as the subsection is currently drafted, an employer is required to pay any worker to whom an order applies not less than the statutory minimum remuneration, which is defined in clauses 14 and 15. Nevertheless, it is considered desirable for this subsection, which creates a criminal offence, to be completely clear and unambiguous. The amendment achieves this objective.

If an employer is convicted of failing to pay a worker not less than the statutory minimum remuneration, clause 16(4) and (5) enable the court to award arrears of wages which have accumulated during the two-year period prior to the date of the offence. As drafted, the effect of clauses 16(4) and (5) is that all remuneration paid to the worker for the entire two-year period would have to be added together and compared with all SMR due for that period. Any shortfall in SMR would be the amount that a court could order the employer to pay to the worker. However, this method of calculation could produce the result that no arrears might be due even though, for some periods during the two years, the worker had been underpaid, or indeed paid no wages at all.

The Government consider that this result is not within the spirit of the legislation and does not adequately protect the interests of workers. That is why we have tabled these amendments. Their effect will be that the court, in deciding the appropriate sum to award by way of arrears, will focus only on weeks or, where appropriate, groups of weeks up to four, during which the worker was underpaid in the two-year period prior to the date of the offence, ignoring weeks when the worker may have received in excess of the minimum, and to make an order for repayment on that basis.

It is necessary to make provision for periods of up to four weeks to be grouped because some workers—most commonly those who work in restaurants, shops and supermarkets — are paid under their contracts by reference to periods of longer than a week—usually a cycle or rota not exceeding four weeks—during each of which they may work a varying number of hours, but for which they are paid a fixed sum each week. Taking the whole of that cycle into account, it might be the case that no underpayment occurred even though, in individual weeks during the cycle, the worker's pay may have been above or below the statutory minimum. In this situation it would be unfair for the week or weeks of underpayment falling within the cycle of employment to be taken separately in the calculation of arrears when, over the whole cycle, the worker had not been underpaid.

These amendments are balanced and sensible and will assist part II to operate as intended. I commend them to the House.

Ms. Clare Short: The Opposition support any amendment that makes it more likely that workers who have been illegally underpaid will get their arrears of pay. This is a small adjustment, but it is welcome and the Opposition do not resist it.

May I ask the Minister to repeat the undertaking that he gave in Committee about the redrafting of clause 17? I am grateful to him for having raised the matter with me and for saying that it is still under consideration and that he intends to hold to his undertaking. It is right, however, that it should be on the record. Will the Minister give an undertaking that his promise to look at the clause and redraft it in the way that was suggested in Committee still holds?

Mr. Trippier: I am glad that the hon. Lady was kind enough to refer to the fact that earlier today we were in touch on this matter. I gave a clear undertaking in Committee, and I do not have the slightest wish to move away from it. We detected in Committee what we believed to be a dichotomy between part I and part II, and I said that on Report we would come back with a clear amendment, which I think will have to be to part II. The parliamentary draftsman says that he requires more time. That is not to suggest, by any stretch of the imagination, that we are moving away from our undertaking. I give a clear undertaking now to the hon. Lady that the clause will be ready for amendment in the other place. I am sure that we shall be able to meet the point that the hon. Lady raised with me in Committee.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 19

OFFICERS

7.45 pm

Mr. Tom Pendry (Stalybridge and Hyde): I beg to move amendment No. 75, in page 19, line 29, at end insert 'and he shall appoint an adequate number of inspectors to ensure that the law is complied with in all workplaces covered by Wages Council orders'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 77, in page 21, line 19, at end, insert—

'(8) Officers acting for the purposes of this Act shall normally prosecute on the first occasion when an offence is discovered.

(9) A report shall be published annually listing the cases where prosecution was not brought and detailing the reasons for non-prosecution'.

Mr. Pendry: These are very important amendments. If the Minister thought that his amendments were balanced and sensible, these are even more so.

Yesterday, a basic myth, which has been widely held, concerning the Tory party was smashed and is now dead and buried. When the Paymaster General rejected new clause 10, which would have given workers the option either to be paid in cash or by cheque, the party that proudly boasts that it is the party of freedom of choice for the individual lost one of its basic claims. We argued that there should be freedom of choice for the worker, but the Government voted against it.

If the Government reject these amendments they will not be seen to be the party of law and order. Many of my right hon. and hon. Friends feel that the Government have already lost that claim, following their disastrous record on crime since 1979. The Government's policy on law enforcement in the industrial sphere is at stake in this debate. We debated at some length in Committee the basic principles that underlie the amendments, but the Minister was at his most unconvincing when he tried to answer the points put to him by me and some of my hon. Friends.

In a BBC Radio 4 interview on 24 April the Under-Secretary of State said that he favoured a firmer line being taken by the wages inspectorate with employers and that he intended to come down like a ton of bricks on recalcitrant employers. That could only mean more prosecutions. The Opposition intend to hold the Minister to that undertaking. However, there are many reasons why the Opposition find it difficult to believe that undertaking. One reason is that, on Second Reading, the Under-Secretary of State said that only 8 per cent. of those who are visited are found to have broken the law, and that the Government were concentrating on the worst offenders. I shall demonstrate later what his Department means when the Minister says that it is dealing with the worst offenders.

There is another good reason for our disbelief in the Minister's intentions: the well-known letter to me of 8 April in which the Minister informed me that he intended to cut the wages inspectorate by 85 personnel following the enactment of the Bill. In other words, 85 policemen—for that is what they are—will be taken away from the already inadequate number of people who are responsible for upholding the law. The charge that was levelled at the Minister then, as now, is that he has grossly overstated the simplification of the wages orders. The Bill is unlikely to reduce the inspection resources needed by the Bill. The most complex provision of current wages orders, the piecework rate, is to be retained and will be made even more important, as clause 15 prevents any other rate from being applied to pieceworkers.

Most of the work of the wages inspectorate consists of visiting employers and checking their records. Although the number of records to be checked will be less, there will still be the same number if not more employers covered by the wages councils.

The absence of records for a significant proportion of workers will present new difficulties. As a result of the exclusion of those up to the age of 21, unscrupulous employers could simply not keep the records required by clause 18(1), especially for home workers. At present, many inspections are confined to the records and the underpayment of workers for whom records are, illegally, not kept will go undetected. Inspectors will have a greater need to interview workers to discover their ages which, at present, employers are required to record. Such interviews would be extremely time-consuming. The Minister has not thought that through.

With regard to home workers, the inspectorate will be completely powerless to carry out any check if the employer denies using home workers under the age of 21. Most of the Minister's claims to justify the proposed cuts in the wages inspectorate are bogus. The exclusion of young workers will not mean less work. The workers may be fewer in number, but the number of firms will be greater. In Committee, the Minister said that more firms would register. We argue that the 21-plus rule introduces an additional age check. From today's debate we learn that the Minister has not thought through the effect of increasing the powers of the wages inspectorate as a consequence of clause 22. That is an obvious case of the Minister not thinking through the need for additional wages inspectors.

How many staff have been allocated to the task of checking and how many will be allocated to cope with the additional responsibilities? In Committee, the Minister claimed that it should be possible to increase the number of postal checks. Such checks are ineffectual and allow the potential underpaying employer a self-check. It also gives an advance warning of a possible factory inspector visit. In how many other areas does a law enforcement officer give advance notice of a visit to check whether an offence has been committed? I hope that the Minister will give details of his plans to expand the postal questionnaire.

The Minister has an opportunity to make the wages inspectorate a truly effective policing body, but he intends to cut that body by 40 per cent. At present, an employer in the wages councils sector can expect, on average, to have a visit from an inspector once every 12 or 14 years. Even then, the employer is forewarned. It is no wonder that there are so few prosecutions. [Interruptions.] It is quite clear that the Minister is not following the argument.

Mr. Trippier: I disagree with it.

Mr. Pendry: If the Minister disagrees, he has every right to intervene.

I do not believe that the Minister can disagree with a great deal of what I have said, as sometimes his own logic would draw similar conclusions. It is no wonder that there are so few prosecutions. Even when there are prosecutions they hardly make a dent in employers' profit margins.

Recent figures from the Department of Employment show just how few prosecutions occur. In 1979, there were 12 investigations which resulted in prosecution and conviction. In 1980 there were eight, in 1981 there were eight, in 1982 there were seven and in 1983 and 1984 there were two.

At constant June 1985 prices, the average amount of fines paid out was £177 in 1979, £246 in 1980, £446 in 1981 and £107 in 1984. There were 8,227 complaints recorded in 1982 and 8,027 in 1983. There were six prosecutions in England in 1982. In 1983 there were two. In 1982 and 1983 there were none in Wales. In Scotland there was one in 1982 and none in 1983. All these figures show the kind of operation which is presently in practice. So much for the Minister's claim that he is concentrating on the worst offenders. Anyone who believes that will believe anything.

A comparison of the number of such prosecutions with the number for television licence evasion makes unlikely reading. In 1984 there were 109,143 prosecutions for television licence evasion. Also in 1984, 27,000 people were prosecuted for not having a licence fixed to their cars. Some 226,000 people were prosecuted for registration offences and some 192,308 people were prosecuted for vehicle test offences.

I could go on, but I do not wish to labour the point. The offences in industry are far worse than some of those offences, but the employers go unpunished. Few of the people prosecuted for the other offences were given a second chance — they were prosecuted on their first offence. Prosecution in industry should be for the first offence. Some employers are punishing the low-paid workers in our community who are sometimes on the poverty line.

There should be an annual listing of prosecutions not brought and detailed reasons for non-prosecution. We could then judge effectively how the Bill is operated and have more meaningful debates on the subject.

The case for amendment No. 75 and amendment No. 77 was made out in Committee when practical illustration after practical illustration was given to the Minister, especially by my hon. Friends the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) and for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo). They described the sweatshop conditions in the east end of London and in Birmingham, and they may give some more examples tonight. The Minister appeared to be listening in Committee as he appears to be listening now, but he does not often respond in a fair and reasonable manner. In truth, I feel a weeny bit sorry for him because he is not in charge of the Bill and nor is his right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General. The long arm of the Treasury effectively controls the Bill. Nevertheless, the Minister's inconsistencies are considerable. In Committee, he said that he wanted an improvement in the register of firms under the purview of the wages inspectorate. He admitted that a number of employers were illegally evading registration. Surely, the logical conclusion of that must be that, if there are more firms, there must be more factory inspectors. The Minister also said he wanted more prosecutions, and the logical conclusion of that must be that there should be more inspectors.

The Minister does not follow his own logic. If he did, he would support our amendments. The Minister's failure to do so shows that he is not in command of the situation. The Government are softer on law and order than anyone thought hitherto. Many unkind people say that the Government are looking after their friends by introducing this legislation. Others would say, more accurately, that the Government's intention is to scrap wages councils. The Bill is a first step in that direction. We will not have to wait too long, however, to have a Government who will reverse that trend. In the meantime, the damage done by legislation such as this must be resisted with all our power.

It is quite possible that following the example of what happened with the Shops Bill, Conservative Members in another place will have a more sensible debate than we have had, and the Bill might be legislated out of sight. If we do not divide the House, it is not because we do not feel strongly about the amendments, but because of lack of time. We await the Minister's reply and expect the other place to hear this debate. It will be able to draw its own conclusions.

All is not lost, however. The Minister might realise that what he said on Radio 4 on 24 April about coming down like a ton of bricks on bad employers can be achieved only by supporting our amendments.

8 pm

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley): This is a subject on which we could go on at great length, expressing our disgust. If ever a clause needed attention, this is it. Before the Committee stage, the House raised the shortage of wages inspectors with Ministers during Question Time. We deliberated the matter at great length in Committee.

The Government's desire to cut the protection of workers is now exposed. The Minister is shaking his head in disagreement. I do not believe that he could make a genuine case justifying reducing the number of wages inspectors. I look forward to his speech, knowing that the only case that the Government can make is rotten.

I should like to put the matter in perspective by illustrating what happens in Manchester. There are only six wages inspectors for the whole of the Greater Manchester area in which there are 25,000 workplaces. Each inspector is therefore responsible for more than 4,000 workplaces.

Mr. Mikardo: Perhaps my hon. Friend would like to carry the arithmetic a little further. If each of the inspectors inspected five establishments a day, which would be a pretty full day's work, he would get round to each establishment once every 18 years on average.

Mr. Eastham: I am obliged to my hon. Friend. They would be extremely fortunate to manage five visits a day as there is paper work to be done, all manner of documentation, and travelling time.

I recall the Minister trying to pacify the Committee by saying that inspectors cope in other ways. They have the magical method, he told us, of going through the Yellow Pages and telephoning factories, presumably asking each, "Are you still operating? Are you abiding by the wages council's guidelines? Could you tell us whether you are breaking the law?" One can just imagine the employers replying, "Yes. Everything is right here. We pay the right rate and conditions are right." That is absurd, but the Government are not satisfied. They have decided to reduce the number of inspectors still further. I remember my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) asking about the decline in the number of wages inspectors. The Minister admitted that there would be further reductions.

When some trade unions made inquiries among working groups in wages council establishments, they discovered that two thirds of the workers were unaware of their legal rights. I realise that that slots in nicely with what the Government want. The Minister said earlier that the Government consulted the employers, who wanted this, that and the other. He never talked about consulting the trade unions and asking them about the Bill.

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Gentleman knows very well that we consulted the trade unions. We discussed this matter at great length in Committee.

Mr. Eastham rose——

Ms. Clare Short: But the Government did not listen to them.

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Lady says that we did not listen. The wages councils have not been completely abolished, so we did listen to a certain extent, did we not?

Mr. Eastham: That is marvellous. What a revelation. The Minister claims that the fact that we still have wages councils proves that the Government listened to the trade unions. Never mind the Bill, he argues, we have a sop in that we still have wages councils. So that is the Minister's consultation. I bet that he want into far more detail with the employers. I bet that he went through the Bill clause by clause establishing what they wanted. The Committee stage lasted nearly three months, but very little has been given to worker groups and the trade unions.

We are faced with sheer hypocrisy. The Government are turning a blind eye to any malpractice and any breach of the law. Anything that employers can get away with goes. The Government applaud this new type of management, which is a form of legal gangsterism. The workshops that are covered by wages inspectors enjoy the worst working conditions.

Mr. Donald Thompson (Calder Valley): Name one.

Mr. Eastham: Never mind about "Name one"; we would be here for about two years giving a list if we were given a little time.

Ms. Short: In a minute I hope to make a speech, and I shall tell the Minister of at least 25 firms in my constituency which are breaking the law—information for which he asked in Committee.

Mr. Eastham: If the hon. Member for Calder Valley (Mr. Thompson) took the trouble even to visit his back yard, never mind the rest of Greater Manchester, the midlands and London, he would probably find scores of such companies. I should be pleased if the media investigated the matter and inquired whether some factories fit within that category. Perhaps we could arrange for inquiries to be made, in view of the hon. Gentleman's remarks.

Workshops are usually unorganised and, unfortunately, without trade unions. Often the majority of workers are women, who are often traditionally timid. That gives rise to gross abuse, and advantage being taken of the workers.

On many occasions the Minister admitted that he recognised there were cases of underpayment. That is one of the biggest and most important issues to which wages inspectors apply themselves. The Minister admitted that an underpayment of £11·9 million over five years had been discovered. Obviously, he immediately said that the wages inspectors intervened and managed to recoup 80 per cent. of that sum. But the fewer inspectors, the greater the sums that will be stolen from workers because of reduced policing action. The truth is that neither the Minister nor the Government want to know because this is a pay-off to employers. With an election approaching, the Government promise this, that and the other, and this time the pay-off is that employers will be allowed to introduce rotten conditions.

I shall conclude by reinforcing some points which my hon. Friend the Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) eloquently put on the record. Home workers are the most exploited worker group. Usually they are married women who cannot go out to work, perhaps because they have young children or sick parents to look after. Consequently, they are not in a position of strength, and are isolated. Their only hope is for support in legislation and from wages inspectors.

This is a blatant example of the Government encouraging sweatshops. The Minister may argue that this new Bill is better than the last Bill, but there is no reason to make it a rotten Bill because the previous one had some inadequacies. Today, we should be introducing a good Bill with clauses which benefit both sides, but this Bill is extremely one-sided. It is loaded on the side of employers.

Ms. Clare Short: Amendment No. 75 requires the Government to appoint an adequate number of inspectors to enforce the law in all workplaces covered by wages councils orders. We are amazed that the Government will resist the amendment. If they resist it, they will be telling us that they do not intend the law to be enforced in all workplaces where wages councils orders should applv?

Amendment No. 76 says that there should be a change in prosecution policy. That is extremely important because the law has been widely breached and employers know that they will not be prosecuted. We want a change in the declared policy of not prosecuting on a first offence to normally prosecuting on a first offence. We do not mean on all occasions. On some occasions it may be reasonable not to prosecute, but we do not accept that the present policy is right. It is a blank cheque to employers to break the law, and they know it.

In Committee the Minister gave us an undertaking—he has been honourable in complying with most of his undertakings — that he would review the prosecution policy. We are looking forward to that review. It is an extremely important undertaking because the need for a change in prosecution policy is urgent.

The problem is that the old law has been widely broken and the inspectorate does not ensure that it is enforced. We now have a weaker law and a weakening of the inspectorate, so we can expect that law to be widely broken and that there will be virtually no standards. The hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) may get what he wants because, in practice, we will not have wages council and the law will not matter in most sectors of industry. There is a real danger of that.

In Committee, the Minister undertook to make a special examination of the new textile industry in my constituency. I am not asking for any special favours for my constituency, but I would like the law to be applied there. That seems to be a reasonable request.

8.15 pm

Mr. Holt: The hon. Lady referred to her constituency. May I remind her that in Committee she also talked about her constituency and said:

"Tuberculosis has reappeared in my area. People who do not have proper housing or clothing and are not eating properly are vulnerable to such diseases". — [Official Report, Standing Committee K, 10 April 1986; c. 508.]

That is exaggerated language. I took the trouble to find out the facts. From 1974 to 1984 the number of cases of tuberculosis in Birmingham fell from 477 to 293.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am finding it difficult to relate these remarks to the amendment.

Ms. Short: The hon. Gentleman's information may be right, but I recently visited a youth training scheme workshop from which two young men had left with TB. That was the case to which I was referring, and I can give chapter and verse to the hon. Gentleman, if that is what he wants. TB has reappeared among young males whom one would not normally expect to have TB. Both the people who run the workshop and I find that shocking, and it is worthy of comment.

The Minister undertook to look into the problems in my constituency, and asked me to provide him with whatever information I could find about them. The experience of my hon. Friend the Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo) of the textile industry in his constituency is noteworthy. My constituency is not a traditional textile area. The new textile industry in the west midlands developed in the late 1970s and accompanied the great rise in unemployment. I have gone to some trouble to answer the Minister's request.

A project called Aekta is based in my constituency and seeks to work, particularly with Asian workers, in the largely Asian new textile industry so that their legal rights are enforced. It produced a report, which was published yesterday, on how the law is widely breached—I hope that the Minister is listening.

Mr. Trippier: I am listening.

Ms. Short: —the Minister is not listening—and how the inspectorate does not assist individuals who approach it for help. The report gives chapter and verse. It is shocking, and I should like to give a copy to the Minister, together with a list of employers, compiled by the project, who are known to have broken the law. I ask the Minister to look at them, and not merely to put the matter right in Ladywood, but to draw lessons about what is going on elsewhere.

The law is being widely flouted. If the Minister proceeds with his present proposals to cut the wages inspectorate and to continue with a no prosecutions policy on a first offence, the law will continue to be flouted. The Government are almost encouraging employers to turn a blind eye to the law. It is outrageous.

In my area, there is an association of the owners of those firms. They advise each other on how to get round the law, and the inspectorate is probably convinced that they do not know the law. It is no excuse for someone to say that he does not know the criminal law. It is time that we prosecuted employers who break the law; then they would all start complying with it. I ask the Minister seriously to comply with the undertaking which he gave in Committee to review prosecution policy. If he reviews it, he will have to concede our other amendment, whether tonight or later, and appoint more wages inspectors because the law cannot be enforced by the present inadequate number or the number after the threatened cut in inspectors.

Mr. Trippier: I am happy to confirm that I am anxious to review the prosecution policy. I am also anxious to study in detail the information which the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) has brought to my attention. In Committee, the hon. Lady sought to draw the attention of all hon. Members to the problem in her constituency. As the Minister responsible for this area, I must consider carefully the position there. No Minister of any Government would condone the breaking of the law.

The hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde (Mr. Pendry) made an uncharacteristic, unfriendly and unkind speech. I have come to know and respect the hon. Gentleman over many years, but he broke with tradition today. I could not believe what I heard. Although the hon. Gentleman was right in quoting accurately from the first part of the letter that I sent to him — I stand by the figures I gave—he did not mention the second page of the letter, which I shall strengthen and develop in my reply to the debate. Indeed, it will form the substantive part of my reply to him and to the hon. Member for Manchester, Blackley (Mr. Eastham)——

Mr. Eastham: It was a very weak second page.

Mr. Trippier: No. I spent a long time putting it together. It was not a case of speaking off the top of my head. It was well prepared, well thought out and researched.

I wish to go a little further than the hon. Member for Blackley was prepared to go in his speech. He quoted what I said on the "Today" programme on Radio 4. It is true that I said that I wanted to take a firmer line, but I also said that we should not come down like a ton of bricks. I also said that it was important to recognise that, as a result of our simplifying the wages council orders, there would be less likelihood of an employer praying in aid the fact that he could not understand the wages council order and that that was why he was underpaying his worker by mistake. All members of the Standing Committee agreed on that point.

Let me try to develop the argument that I put in the letter to the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde, which still bears close examination. First, I said that, as a result of the legislation,

"wages orders will not have any of the present complexities and it will be simpler and quicker to check compliance; there will be much less likelihood of underpayment due to employers being unable to understand the intentions of councils; workers will be clear about their legal entitlement; the number of workers whose pay has to be checked will be about 20 per cent. less because those under 21 years of age are to be excluded; and it should be possible to increase the proportion of initial checks carried out by postal questionnaire."

Mr. Eastham: The Minister's remarks show that it does not matter about those below the age of 21. It reduces the numbers.

Mr. Trippier: That is not the point and the hon. Gentleman knows it. We are talking about two different things. We are talking about taking those aged under 21 out of the purview of the wages councils. What joins the Opposition and the Government is that we are determined to ensure that the law is observed. By any standards, the figures given by the Opposition on Second Reading and in Committee are wildly exaggerated. During the past three years, 5 per cent. of the workers whose pay was checked by inspectors were found to be underpaid. We are worried about the percentage of workers, at least, that is what I thought we were discussing in Committee.

Mr. Eastham rose——

Mr. Trippier: May I finish this exposition of my letter to the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde? The sixth point was that a significant reduction in the inquiries received by wages inspectorate officers is expected. On compliance with wages council legislation, I said that figures were not available yet for Greater Manchester. How the hon. Member for Blackley can say that he has the figure when we have not made a decision on it stretches credulity to breaking point.

Mr. Eastham: It is no great state secret. I got the information from the Low Pay Unit.

Mr. Trippier: I could have put money on its being the Low Pay Unit.

Ms. Clare Short: It is usually right.

Mr. Trippier: We have had some disputes about what the Low Pay Unit says, and we discussed it at some length in Committee. I assure the hon. Member for Stalybridge and Hyde and his hon. Friends, including the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo), who is worried about it, that I am anxious, where possible, to ensure that there is compliance. It cannot be in the interests of any Government to be seen to encourage people to break the law. It cannot be good for the industries in the wages council sector.

The worst signal that could go to employers is going out from this debate. The Opposition are signalling the fact that employers can get away with it. That is the exact point that I was anxious to make on the "Today" programme. I make it clear again on the Floor of the House that the people who assume that they will get away with it can forget it.

Mr. Mikardo: Does the Minister believe that the employers in the sweatshop industries did not know before today's debate that they could get away with breaking the law? I listened to him with care, but I must tell him that I gave up believing in fairy tales at the age of seven.

I shall detain the House for only a minute to make a simple point. I often understand a Minister's rejection of an amendment even when I do not agree with it, but I am bound to say that the Minister's rejection of amendment No. 75 is incomprehensible. It beggars belief. Here is the Minister with his big talk about our all wanting the law to be enforced, but he refuses to accept the obligation to appoint an adequate number of inspectors to ensure that the law is complied with. The Minister is saying, "I want the law to be complied with, but I will not take the one measure without which we cannot ensure that the law will be complied with."

Mr. Trippier: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

8.30 pm

Mr. Mikardo: I shall give way later, because I wish to ask the Minister a question.

I am trying to persuade one of my noble Friends in the other place to table an amendment, because I want to suss out the sincerity of the Department of Employment. I want him to table an amendment saying:

"The Minister shall appoint a number of inspectors inadequate to ensure that the law is complied with".

This would create a situation in which the employer can break the law with impunity. Will the Government spokesman accept that with avidity, because that is the only logical consequence? I remind the Minister that he is speaking for the party that claims to be the party of law and order. This representative of the party of law and order is now saying, "I am going to give encouragement to employers to break the law with impunity, as I refuse to set up the machinery that prevents them from doing it."

Mr. Trippier: But I am not going to say that.

Amendment 75, as worded, if strictly interpreted would present the Government, any Government, with an impractical task, a mandatory requirement to provide "an adequate number of inspectors to ensure that the law is complied with in all workplaces".

That is truly unrealistic, and the hon. Gentleman knows it.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move amendment No. 76, in page 19, line 32, at end insert

'. and if it appears to any such officer that any person with whom he has dealings while so acting does not know that he is an officer acting for the purposes of this Part he shall identify himself as such to that person.'.

There was a full debate in Committee on whether wages inspectors should as a matter of course automatically produce their authenticated documents on every occasion on which they had dealings with any person in connection with enforcing part II of the Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) argued forcefully that this was essential on the grounds of courtesy and common sense and because officials generally had too many powers of entry. The Government took the view that the act of producing the warrant, as the inspector's document is called, tends to create a barrier of officialdom between employer and inspector and can prevent the inspection from being carried out in a helpful and constructive manner.

I indicated to the Committee that in practice the inspector initially identifies himself by means of a printed visiting card that shows his name, office address and telephone number which the employer or worker can retain for future reference. This arrangement, readily acceptable to the employer, has worked well for many years. He always produces his warrant when asked to do so.

The hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Mr. Mikardo), like my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington, put a fairly compelling case. Although the amendment was lost in Committee, none the less I thought it fair, in view of what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington and by the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar, to return with this amendment, which I think meets in part, if not totally, the points raised in Committee.

Mr. Fallon: I thank my hon. Friend for going even further than his original undertaking. As I recall, he undertook to look at the matter again if I withdrew the amendment.

The dispute in Committee arose from the distinction between the officer identifying himself — none of us wants bogus people on the premises or people falsely claiming to be officers of various departments — and establishing the rights given to him under the schedule and his ability to exercise them on the premises. I think that this is a rather confused area, although in the main my hon. Friend has gone further than he did originally when several times he attempted to dissuade us from dividing the Committee.

I hope that the amendment will be satisfactory to the inspectors. I know that my hon. Friend was concerned that their task should be made no more difficult. I am sure that it will be satisfactory to those business men for whom the first visit from the inspectors can be a traumatic experience.

I am delighted to welcome the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

New Clause 6

Redundancy Payments

'The provisions of Part III of the Act shall not take effect until the national insurance payments made by employers and employees into the redundancy fund are reduced to a level sufficient to cover no more than the likely costs to the fund of redundancy payments.'.—[Mr. Prescott.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Prescott: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 80, in clause 32, page 29, line 39, leave out 'August' and insert 'November'.

Mr. Prescott: There are two principles embodied in these proposals. New clause 6 is concerned with the principles of the contribution and distributiom of the redundancy fund. Amendment No. 80 is concerned largely with the date. Dealing with the times from which the proposals in the Bill would apply to remove the rebate of 35 per cent. to companies employing over 10 people in redundancy situations, the date is 1 August. Although the date in the Bill, as I recall, is 31 July, it is effectively applicable from 1 August.

The debate in Committee showed that we recognise that the redundancy fund established in 1965 has covered different forms of rebates. It started with something like 75 per cent. This was changed by the previous Labour Government to 50 per cent. A year or so ago it went to about 35 per cent., the level at which it remains.

The operations of the fund are such that it is a contributory fund in terms of the employee and the employer. Its profits in its last year of operation were about £9 million, according to the last annual report, with approximately £751 million in receipts. While that is not a large amount, the fund is in surplus and has attracted the attention of the Chancellor. The first mention of it came in the Budget speech when he proposed to remove the 35 per cent. rebate in the case of companies with more than 10 employees. The Chancellor estimates that there will be a saving of about £200 million. The justification, according to the Government, is that this would be used to fund some of the employment scheme measures, particularly those which are long term. It is a pity that the moneys that we are always finding from one source or another are all for employment schemes and never to do with real training or jobs, but that is the nature of this Government's approach.

It is perhaps appropriate that we should be debating this on the day on which the unemployment figure is at a record level of well over 3·2 million. Considering that and the scale of redundancies, the levels of unemployment in the country are on a scale comparable to the 1930s. Unemployment now lasts longer and has been increasing every year for six years. In the 1930s, the increase each year continued for four years. That is the scale of change in the economy that has taken place in recent years. That has had an effect on redundancies and subsequently the great claims that are being made. After the recent announcement, there are to be further redundancies in a number of companies.

Our position was made clear in Committee. We did not wish to amend the relevant clause or the one concerning dates and times. We thought that the redundancy fund was paying out fairly. The 35 per cent. kept it in balance with a surplus of £9 million.

If the Government were so concerned about the money, perhaps the surpluses could be paid off, as our amendment suggests, to the employers and the employees by making a reduction in their contributions. Instead, the Government have chosen to save money and use it in another way. The case is not unique. There is a strong feeling that, with contributory funds, the Government are denying the rights for which the people paying and then denying them benefits promised from the fund. Employees and employers were promised that they would receive in redundancy cases a 35 per cent. rebate. That was changed, which is a denial of benefit to people who have paid into the redundancy fund.

[Mr. Prescott]

My memory goes back to the graduated pension fund, another great swindle perpetrated on the British electorate. Despite the fact that people had paid contributions, the Government finished the fund, the money was transferred and the benefits were either denied or were so small as not to be worth a great deal. The earnings-related benefit is a more modern example. If a private company had changed the fund in the same way, it would have been taken to court. The Government, with their power, can raid public funds, and today another public fund is raided to finance some of the Government's other policies—in this case, employment schemes. We have not sought to amend the Bill in this way, but we are making it clear that, to be fair, the surplus should go to those employers and employees who have contributed.

We hear a great deal from the Government about the costs of industry, and here we are talking about, as the CBI pointed out, an extra £200 million of costs on industry for financing redundancies. Unemployment is continually increasing, and no member of the Government is able to say when it will stop doing so, let alone go down. We can assume that redundancies will continue apace. If we wanted any reminder of that, we have only to listen to the radio or watch the television today. About 4,000 people are to lose their jobs in the shipyards; British Caledonian will be making 1,000 redundant; and today the first suggestion came of more redundancies, at British Rail Engineering Ltd, which will mean that a few more thousand are unemployed, leaving BR ready for the privatisation proposed by the Government, or the transfer of the parcels business. Perhaps many of these companies will be encouraged to rush through their redundancy programmes because substantial amounts of money are still available under the 35 per cent. rebate on redundancy.

In Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) asked whether the 90-day principle applied. Clearly, if it were applicable until August, 90 days before that would be 1 May. If a company — say, British Caledonian or British Shipbuilders — puts in an application now, will the company be able to get the money for redundancies? If it will, that will encourage companies to throw people out of work much more quickly than they might otherwise do. In that sense, the Government may be using their £200 million for employment schemes, but they have created a financial incentive for people to be thrown out of work at a faster rate. We may not have seen the end of that, because this can run up to 1 August.

Perhaps it is the Paymaster General's view that, by bringing the scheme forward to August, the Government will avoid a mass of redundancies because people will wait even longer than a year. The Minister needs to give us a clear answer showing how that applies. An answer was not given in Committee, and Ministers may not have known it. However, the Minister should tell us the position of a company that makes application for payment under the fund. Is the payment allowable on the day that the redundancy takes place or from when the company gives notice and makes the application for the redundancy fund?

That brings us directly to our amendment, which is about setting a time. In Committee on 29 April, the date of 31 July was written into the Bill, but that is creating a number of problems. The first is that to which I have just referred — companies rushing through redundancy schemes. A second difficulty arises out of other legislation. In Committee on the Transport Act, we warned that the Act would bring about many redundancies and reductions in services, and that deregulation would be disastrous. The Government have never accepted that argument, but it seems that the by-elections and local elections have painfully printed it on their minds.

8.45 pm

Mr. Nellist: My hon. Friend may be interested in the figures from the west midlands. We already know that 500 of the 1,800 buses in the west midlands will stay in the garages from 26 October. If this part of the Bill goes through unamended, with the loss of the 35 per cent. rebate to the transport authorities, which have already had their grants cut by the Secretary of State for Transport, the redundancies, with which I disagree, will be even higher because the authorities will have to find the 35 per cent. as well as the cuts in the transport supplementary grant.

Mr. Prescott: I was coming to that point.

The passenger transport executives, or the district authorities such as Hull, will have many difficulties. Several of my hon. Friends may mention the case of south Yorkshire, where all the PTEs expect redundancies as a result of the reorganisation now that the subsidies and funding for transport have been reduced. South Yorkshire will lose about 1,800 jobs. All the PTEs together will lose about 9,000.

This is a problem not just for the PTEs but for the municipal bus corporations. In previous legislation, it was agreed that there will be a transfer to another body—for example, in Hull, to a private company. The local authorities cannot give financial support to those companies from 25 October. That would mean that the transfer has to be done by August. Therefore, most PTEs and municipal authorities, with the reorganisation required of them by previous legislation, took into account the redundancies that will take place and the cost of financing them. However, they are now being denied the 35 per cent. rebate, which they assumed would apply to October or November — hence the relevance of our November amendment. The PTEs no longer have the resources to fund the level of redundancies except by cutting services or by making even more redundancies, and problems could be even more accelerated, bringing about yet more redundancies.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): There is no supplementary rate either.

Mr. Prescott: My hon. Friend reminds me about my next point — the similar legislation on financing that prevents councils from making a supplementary rate. Other legislation has not been co-ordinated with this date. The Chancellor saw a chance to get a few bob on the side to finance his employment scheme, and to take a penny off the rate of income tax. It would have been better to keep the tax at the same rate and fund the employment schemes, but he wants to give money to those who can well afford to live without tax cuts. He has robbed redundancy funds to find that money.

If the councils are not to raise a supplementary rate, how are they to get over their difficulties? If the Government would accept an amendment to extend the scheme to November, the PTEs could proceed to do what has already been determined under the financing of their reorganisation as required under other legislation. On 29 April, the Minister made it clear, when challenged by a number of my hon. Friends:

"I have no doubt that we shall divide on it. If it assists the hon. Gentleman, I shall write to him and the hon. Member for Ladywood, with a copy to each member of the Committee, take on board the points made and explore still further whatever I undertook to consider this morning. I can say no more than that." —[Official Report, Standing Committee K, 29 April 1986; c. 879.]

I note that he wrote to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) and probably to one or two other members of the Committee. He made it clear in the letter that discussions were still being undertaken with the Department of Transport and the Department of the Environment. He did not think that he would be able to amend the Bill on Report. There is a possibility therefore that he will have it amended in another place.

We should like to know what the Paymaster General thinks about this matter. Is he making desperate phone calls and conducting discussions? Perhaps he could enlighten the House as to what is happening on this important matter. What does he intend to do in another place to amend this point?

There is a great deal of anxiety among transport authorities at the moment. They have carried out their statutory obligations under other legislation but now find themselves forced against the wall. The Government, in all justice, could keep their principles by accepting the amendment. They could say that the change will not be applicable until 1 November.

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): The Government have hit the jackpot again with part III. The trade unions and the employers, through the Confederation of British Industry, have said that they do not want the redundancy payments to be tampered with or effectively removed in relation to Government contributions. That point was revealed in an article in the Financial Times on 17 March, which we discussed fully in Committee. It showed that the Government are out of tune with what is happening in industry.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) made a number of pertinent points, and I should like to cover several other matters which cover future employment patterns and so discuss what the Government are putting on the employers' plate.

The Government's action over the qualification period for redundancy pay could mean, as my hon. Friend the Member for. Kingston upon Hull, East said, that redundancies will be declared in the near future. The Government's actions could accelerate the number of redundancies either before 1 August, or beyond that date, depending on the Paymaster General's reply about the 90-day period. The Government's action could spark off a considerable number of redundancies in companies which are considering rationalisation, and we have seen many examples of such redundancies this week.

When the Bill reaches the statute book, it could destabilise the labour market. An employer will ensure that he does not have long-term employees, and therefore will not have to bear the full burden of redundancy costs. In future, an employer might not necessarily declare a policy, but will work to a policy which will ensure that people are not on payrolls for more than two or three years. This will ensure that the employer has to pay only a minimum amount of redundancy pay at any one time. I could quote many examples of industries where that kind of attitude might be prevalent.

Redundancy payments have been funded on a commonsense approach. Through national insurance contributions, all industries contribute to the redundancy payments fund. The sole burden for redundancy payments is not placed on the industries which are having problems with finance or restructuring. The burden has been borne, to some extent, by profitable industries, and the employees in the successful industries have been paying into the central fund, which has been used to make redundancy payments. Responsibility has been shared across industry and commerce throughout the United Kingdom.

When part III reaches the statute book, it will compound the problems of the industries which are having difficulties with finance or restructuring. Liquidations and closures might be brought forward because, if there are more than 10 workers in a company, that company will have to bear 35 per cent. of the redundancy payments. Increasing the redundancy payment burden to 35 per cent. might tip the balance for a small company, employing 12 or 14 people, which was previously on an even keel. It could cause that small company to go into liquidation or bring in the receiver. The collective funding of redundancy will be altered and a company will have to bear the full cost of any redundancy pay. Rather than helping small businesses or industries which are in financial difficulties or which are restructuring, the Government are compounding their problems.

I should like to consider amendment No. 80, which is important for my constituency in south Yorkshire. If the amendment is not accepted, or if there is no response from the Government to our proposition, there could be serious problems for constituencies such as mine.

My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East, was fortunate to receive a letter from the Minister. In Committee I asked:

"Will the Minister do the same with the Department of Transport, with regard to transport supplementary grant? Probably as profound a case can be made on this as has been made by my hon. Friend on the local authorities."

The Minister replied:

"Absolutely, I am delighted to respond to the hon. Gentleman on that point."[Official Report, Standing Committee K, 29 April 1986, c. 870.]

I have not received a letter on that issue, and I have not seen the correspondence to which my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East, referred.

South Yorkshire passenger transport executive is probably the executive that has been hit hardest. It has had to bear about £30 million worth of cuts in transport supplementary grant. This has caused fare increases of 250 to 300 per cent. It has also meant a reduction in services, and a reduction of 35 per cent. in the number of passengers carried.

The effect of the Transport Act 1985 on south Yorkshire has been to rip the heart out of the community. Now, in this part of the Bill, we see the vultures of the Department of Employment homing in to pinch another £1·5 million to £2 million. This means that we could see further redundancies, in addition to the 1,600 redundancies which south Yorkshire will experience as a result of the Transport Act.

South Yorkshire made representations to the Secretary of State for Transport on the transport supplementary grant. In Committee the Minister refused even to look at the redundancy payments issue, but at least the calculation of the transport supplementary grant did include something for redundancies. From that date to this, as a result of part III, the full cost will have to be borne. It is estimated that in south Yorkshire this will be about £1·5 million.

Will south Yorkshire reduce services further and have more redundancies? It will not be able to go out to tender or subsidise those routes. Will it put the fares up? It can do that, and if it does there is every chance that passenger numbers will decline again, leading to further redundancies.

It is now incumbent upon the Paymaster General to answer the questions that we put in Committee. Those questions must be answered within the next few weeks, because the tenders for those routes have gone out and decisions have to be made. It might mean that the executive will bring forward the redundancies to some time in July, to protect the services and stop further fare increases.

Unless the Paymaster General or a Minister from the Department of Transport gives us a decision, things will be extremely difficult for PTEs throughout the country. It is estimated that as a result of the movement of three months they will lose about £9 million which will effectively be taken away from the subsidies for the routes, many of which will be rural routes, which I have no doubt many Conservative Members would wish to maintain.

I hope that the Paymaster General will accept the modest amendments. If he is not prepared to do so, it is incumbent upon him to tell us how the PTEs and the other local authorities will operate.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): Amendment No. 80 contains an entirely reasonable and responsible proposition, and it is that proposition to which my brief remarks will be addressed. This matter should not be considered now; it should already have been resolved. The Government clearly bear a serious responsibility and it should have been accepted before now.

My hon. Friends the Members for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) and for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn) have put the basic arguments. The fact remains that the PTEs have been placed in a dreadful position over their redundancies. They have been put in that position as a result of the timing in the Bill. I imagine that if any Minister were here from the Department of Transport he would have to accept — he could not deny — that the arrangements made by the PTEs have been dreadfully imperilled, and they were made at the behest of this Administration.

As the Bill stands, the proposals mean that PTEs in south Yorkshire and elsewhere face substantial burdens which in this financial year may be intolerable. They made those arrangements in response to Government policy, and the Secretary of State for Transport was well aware of them and could be said to have been a party to those arrangements.

As has been pointed out, the PTEs cannot raise interim revenue directly. Rate capping and other local authority expenditure controls make that clear. Nor can they guarantee to raise the income which will otherwise be required if the Government do not accept the amendment, because if they increase fares, the certainty in south Yorkshire is that ridership will decline, and income might be diminished rather than enhanced. The PTEs cannot easily make additional redundancies. The burden accepted is already well nigh intolerable. In any case, if they make additional redundancies they could aggravate the situation about which we are complaining now.

As a result of the Bill, passenger transport executives are being squeezed between the upper millstone of Government negligence and the lower millstone of Government incompetence. The Secretary of State for Transport is not present, but someone from that Department should be here. The passenger transport executive acted in good faith. It was not enthusiastic about the arrangements. We in south Yorkshire do not like the arrangements, and I do not think that any of the other PTEs in metropolitan areas like them either. The PTE made a democratic response to statute, and now the Government have changed the ground rules. That is intolerable.

I should have thought that at least a junior Minister from the Department of Transport would have the grace to come to the House to make it clear that that problem, which the Department created, and which the Department of Employment is now compounding, exists. In the absence of such a Minister, the Paymaster General must make a responsible response to the House; otherwise the Government will once again be shown up in a very poor light. By their response to amendment No. 80, the Government will demonstrate whether they are prepared to act with integrity, like a sensible Administration.

Before we conclude this debate, I hope that the Government will recognise that the PTEs have a powerful case. The Government should respond to it and relieve the anxieties that exist in my PTE area in south Yorkshire and in all the other PTE areas. I trust that the Paymaster General will reassure us that there will not be any insistence on the irresponsibility and incompetence to which I have referred.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): I wish to reinforce the arguments made about the clause and the amendment. I am sure that the Paymaster General did not envisage the problems that would be created by altering the redundancy scheme, particularly in relation to the south Yorkshire PTE. When legislation makes a change, there is always a dividing line, and there are always problems with it. There are always losers and winners on either side of the dividing line. The problem is where to draw it.

I believe that the Government are slowly moving towards not making any contributions at all. People will be dismissed, and will get just a vote of thanks before moving down the road. We are discussing how the legislation will affect, in particular, the south Yorkshire PTE. We pointed out the problems that deregulation would cause and we will be proved right. South Yorkshire has had to cut about 30 per cent. of its traffic. By and large that affects the rural areas, weekend services, and school and hospital services. I have a list of the services being tendered for. There are fairly isolated areas round Penistone, but there are no Sunday or Saturday services. The first bus into Penistone is at 8 am and the last bus out is at 7 pm. We do not yet know how people will get to work. That is why we are trying to overcome some of these problems.

No one knows what the cost to the local education authority will be. After all, all the school services have been stopped. I accept that the process has not yet come to an end. But this is where the legislation is relevant. The £9 million that it will cost the south Yorkshire PTE is the £9 million that it hopes to use for subsidies. Thus, one Department is not thinking about the effect of its legislation on another. The amendment does not make a very big change, but it is a sensible change. There is nothing to stop the Paymaster General accepting it. He could give us an assurance that he will consider it, or arrange for the Bill to be altered in the other place. However, he should not dismiss our arguments out of hand by rejecting the amendment.

About 30 per cent. of our bus services have disappeared. I hope that we can find the money to reinstate them. If the Bill is not amended, the PTE will have to make 1,600 people redundant immediately. That is the only way that it can save £9 million to £10 million. However, we are approaching the holiday period and, if it makes 1,600 people redundant, how will it cope with holiday absences? It would mean even less services.

Of course, the PTE could try to recoup the finance from another area. However, fares have already risen by 250 to 300 per cent. and there has also been a severe cut in services. If the PTE has to raise fares again, that will mean even fewer services and more redundancies. Where will the PTE find the money? Local authorities cannot increase rates or they will face rate capping. It is a catch-22. Without any shadow of doubt, the problems are very serious.

I am sure that the Paymaster General did not consider the problems that would be caused. Government policy has caused problems by deregulation of transport, and Government policy will cause further problems with transport, which the local authorities will have to overcome. Rather than compound the problems, the Government should accept an amendment that would help to alleviate them.

All local authorities budget for a 12-month period. Indeed, the Government have stopped local authorities from making any interim rate increases. That is another outlet that the Government have blocked, and there are no longer any gaps or outlets for the PTE. I ask the Government seriously to consider the problems that this legislation will cause. It is bad legislation. Local authorities have budgeted on the Government's original intentions, and that should not be altered now.

Mr. Nellist: My hon. Friend said that one avenue of escape for the south Yorkshire PTE was to bring forward the 1,600 redundancies. The social security costs for 1,600 sacked workers must be about £100,000 or £200,000 a week, so for every week that the redundancies are brought forward the DHSS will have to find a couple of hundred thousand pounds. That is another financial idiocy in this part of the Bill.

Mr. McKay: My hon. Friend is right — the Bill shuffles the problems from one Department to another. It is hardly the way to treat workers who have worked for a firm for 30 or 40 years. All the planning has been carried out in accordance with Government wishes.

Mr. Caborn: The PTE faces another problem. Within the normal functioning of a commercial department, the profit from one area can be transferred to a less profitable area; it is called cross-subsidisation. However, that option has been removed by the Transport Act. The PTE cannot transfer profits from a route in a city or town to a less profitable route. Every avenue has been closed.

Mr. McKay: Every loophole has been closed and there is no room left to manouevre. It is ridiculous to introduce such proposals halfway through a financial year. If a local authority had done that, there would be slapped wrists and bottoms. If the Paymaster General thinks about the problems a little more deeply, he will come to realise that he should never have brought forward the proposal.

We are asking the Minister to have another think. The Government will not gain anything by implementing this provision because any benefit to them will be lost in DHSS payments. The people need to be treated in a better way than that which the Government propose.

9.15 pm

Mr. Dixon: This issue arose in Committee on 29 April. Any employer who pays out more than 100 employees must give 90 days' notice of his intention to do so. The idea of that notice—the Paymaster General should know this because he is the Minister in charge of labour relations —is to enable trade union representatives to negotiate with employers to ascertain whether some of the redundancies can be avoided or whether the impact of redundancies can be alleviated. For example, it is sometimes possible to arrange transfers. Any employer who wanted to qualify for the 35 per cent. discount would have had to give the unions notice two days after the Government's amendment was moved. The amendment was moved on 29 April and the 90-day requirement for negotiations with trade unions would have compelled employers to issue notices only two days afterwards.

We did not receive a satisfactory explanation from the Minister in Committee. He told us that a decision had been taken above his head and explained that it would save £55 million in public expenditure. In fact, he meant that £55 million would be stolen from the contributions made by employees and employers to the central fund.

The purpose behind the Government's amendment was to steal money from others, and they are damaging industrial relations. It will be impossible for anyone to qualify for the redundancy rebate and for the unions to be given 90 days notice to negotiate with the employer to try to avoid redundancies by, for example, arranging transfers.

Mr. Flannery: Those of us who were not members of the Committee are beginning only now to grasp the trickery that has gone on. The issue before us arose only on the Committee's final sitting. It is almost unbelievable that the Government should have introduced such a provocative measure at this stage. Anyone who canvassed prior to the local elections will realise that the Government are in a mess. They could not have planned their own demise more brilliantly.

We in south Yorkshire feel especially deeply about the Government's proposals. In part, that is because we have only just learnt about them. The ordinary people in the area are unaware of what has gone on. The Minister may laugh, but the facts have not been brought home to ordinary people.

In south Yorkshire, we have kept fares down to the best of our ability. There was a larger vote at every election for the Labour party because of its policy of holding down the level of fares. It was a process of real democracy. Rate capping pushed us into an extremely difficult position and the result was that fares had suddenly to be tripled. Indeed, they will have to be increased again.

On Saturday morning, I travelled into Sheffield from outside the town. I had to pay nearly four times as much for my ticket as I had been used to paying. I travelled on a one-man bus. Nowadays, most buses do not have clippies. The bus on which I travelled pulled up at every stop. Because it was a one-man bus, the driver was completely occupied collecting fares, to the danger of the public. On double decker buses, vandalism and activities of that nature could take place upstairs. That poses great difficulty. I cannot believe that the Government could plan to do what they have done at the last minute. If it were explained to an ordinary person, he would not believe that it could happen.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay) implied at one point, in an otherwise careful, considered and clear speech, that we might be moving to a position whereby an employee who faces the unfortunate possibility of redundancy might lose his statutory entitlement. That is certainly not contemplated by the Government or the Bill. When we consider the amendments, we must bear in mind which part of the Bill they relate to. The Bill does not affect in the slightest the statutory entitlement to redundancy compensation of an employee who faces redundancy. The Bill aims to get rid of a method of financing companies that make redundancies — a method which in our opinion, is obsolete.

I shall not repeat the arguments I used on Second Reading to explain why economic circumstances have changed since the measure was introduced. The rebates actually make it cheaper and easier for an employer to contemplate redundancy. An employer receives a subsidy — it was reduced by the Labour Government and ourselves to 35 per cent.—which is taken out of a fund to which employers and employees contribute. It is a churning of money to make it easier to make people redundant. In the present conditions of unemployment, we did not think that that should continue.

Because the payments out of the fund, by the conventions used by former Governments and our own, technically count as public expenditure, we were able to make public expenditure savings which we have diverted to the other employment measures which we announced last autumn and in this year's Budget.

Neither the Opposition's proposed new clause nor their amendment challenges the fundamental policy decision to end the rebates. Both bear on the timing of the change. Assuming that the House carries the Bill, that it goes to another place and becomes law, I expect that, if the labour party ever came to power, it would not bring back the redundancy rebate system, in view of present labour circumstances.

The new clause and the amendment essentially urge delay. One says that we should delay until the contributions to the fund have been brought down so that the fund pays for redundancy payments only, and the other says that we should delay from August to November. That is the only issue before us regarding the new clause and the amendment.

I can understand, in some ways, the need for delay, but I do not think that it goes with the arguments that have been made to us about the fear that employers will somehow speed up redundancies in order to get the rebate. In my opinion, that is not a relevant consideration. Normally, employers declare redundancies only when they are forced to do so. They do so extremely reluctantly. Nobody times redundancies to get a rebate. I think that under the arrangement, an employer receives, on average, £600 each rebate. If an employer is contemplating redundancies and is tempted to speed them up then, of course, the more time that is given before the change comes into effect the more likely it is that people will act to speed up the redundancies.

The hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) intervened briefly and said how bad it was that we had tabled an amendment in such a way that employers planning large redundancies, who had to give 90 days notice to the trade unions, had only two days in which to do so. If he really feels that there is a danger of employers rushing forward, which I do not agree with, all I can say is that if we give them more time there is more chance of them bringing forward redundancies.

We had to introduce an operative date. Whatever date we chose, there would have been hardship for some employers from a cash flow point of view. The more time we give, as advance warning, that we plan to end the rebates, the more likely it is that an employer who feels doomed to make redundancies, and for some reason is tempted to bring them forward to get the rebate, will actually do so. I do not follow that point.

I shall deal with the practical reasons why the new clause and the amendment are somewhat misconceived. It is important to realise that the fund is not just for redundancy payments. It will not be wound up completely. Last year, as well as paying out nearly £250 million in rebates to employers and £55 million direct to employees when their employer defaulted on the redundancy payments they were due, the fund paid out some £50 million to employees who were owed arrears of wages, accrued holiday pay, pay in lieu of notice and certain other debts when their employer had gone into liquidation, receivership or bankruptcy owing money to the employees. When the Bill is enacted, the fund will still be paying out statutory redundancy payments to those redundant workers whose firms could not afford to pay what they owed and will be paying out those other sums owed to employees when a firm unfortunately goes into receivership. The basis upon which the new clause is intended to operate is misconceived.

The new clause refers also to contribution levels by employers and employees to the inevitably reduced fund. I accept that that is a relevant point, but I point out that every autumn we review the contribution levels for national insurance generally. Any changes are included in the Social Security Contributions (Rerating) Order which both Houses debate in November or December each year. At present, the contributions to the redundancy fund represent 0·25 percentage points of the standard 9 per cent. employee's national insurance contribution and 0·15 percentage points of the employer's standard 10·45 percent. contribution. When the time comes to make the rerating order, obviously my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Social Services and the Chancellor will have to look at the total make up of what is required to finance all the national insurance funds.

Mr. Prescott: Put up the rates. That is another £200 million.

Mr. Clarke: The rates might even come down.

The fund is in surplus and, obviously, payments are not likely to go down. That is only one part of the picture. Under the present arrangements, all Governments have to consider all the components of the overall contribution together if they are to make any sensible changes. We cannot do that until the autumn.

It has been said that we are stealing the money from the fund. All sorts of allegations have been made. Obviously, some hon. Members have a vision of a swag bag being put over someone's shoulder and carried away.

Mr. Prescott: £200 million.

Mr. Clarke: Thanks to the accounting convention used by Governments, this is one of those marvellous public spending savings where we do not take away any money from the fund.

Changing the rebate entitlements in August, rather than next April, does not cost the fund any money. The £140 million which is saved stays in the fund and earns interest for the fund. But the reduction in public expenditure, which counts now, enables us to boost our spending on the positive employment measures which we announced in one instalment last November and again in this year's Budget.

For those reasons, I ask the House to accept that the new clause and the amendment which are designed to alter the time when a change comes into effect—I cannot believe that any hon. Member would contemplate reversing that — are misconceived and should be rejected.

The hon. Members for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn), for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy), for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) and for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) have raised a matter on behalf of the south Yorkshire passenger transport executive, and it is relevant also to the west midlands passenger transport executive and other such bodies. They are concerned with the impact on those groups if the Bill becomes operative in August and with possible redundancies that those PTEs will have to make as they prepare to make themselves more competitive and face up to the new position in the autumn. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East thought that this matter arose out of legislation we used to debate when we both spoke on transport Bills. We disagreed on the deregulation of coach transport and I have no doubt that we disagree in the same way about the deregulation of local bus services. I am an enthusiastic supporter of the recent Transport Act and I believe that improvements will come from deregulation.

9.30 pm

I do not think that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East or I would claim to have bang up-to-date knowledge of all the technical details which flowed from the Transport Bill, on which we were not directly engaged. I do not know that within the passenger transport authorities the PTEs are looking to a date when they will become separate entities with their own trading accounts. There is a tendering exercise to go through in the summer before we will know the full extent of the services available in south Yorkshire, the west midlands and elsewhere. I will not be drawn into debating the transport policies of the south Yorkshire passenger transport authority. I am on record as having discussed that in the past. I regarded the business of freezing the fares to some set date, which I believe was back in the 1960s, as absurd and loading the Government with subsidy and the ratepayers of Sheffield with an unnecessary burden. That is all behind us.

Having listened to the speeches, I know hon. Members obviously feel very strongly that a problem is being faced by the passenger transport authority. I have had some talks with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport following the exchanges that took place between my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary and others in Committee and I shall certainly continue those discussions. Some of the figures bandied about as to the costs struck me as extraordinary. If, in order to enter the new competition, redundancies are contemplated, costs will obviously arise and the effect of those costs on passenger transport undertakings will depend on the day on which they take effect. I was asked some questions about that. If the redundancy is one of which notice has been given and which has taken effect before 1 August, rebate will be payable. If there is a late claim, after 1 August, but the redundancy became due before that date again, rebate will be payable. Thereafter, rebate will not be payable.

Until the tendering exercise has been undertaken, hon. Members cannot make assertions about what services they will or will not have, as the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone tried to do, and nobody can calculate with precision how many redundancies might be necessary. I have not claimed expertise on this matter. I have undertaken to consider the points made by the members from Yorkshire and the west midlands and to continue discussions with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport to ensure that an announcement is made on behalf of the Government in time for consideration in another place.

Mr. Allen McKay: Is it correct that the Minister accepts that people made redundant before 1 August will be subject to rebate but those made redundant after 1 August will not? I do not accept the right hon. and learned Gentleman's arguments because one has to plan 12 months or two years ahead and, irrespective of what the Minister says, at least 1,600 people will be made redundant, even in the best scenario. Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman saying that, if notice is given before 1 August that the PTE is expecting 1,600 redundancies in October, they will receive a rebate?

Mr. Clarke: If the notice is given and dismissal on the grounds of redundancy takes place before 1 August and the claim is made the rebate will be received. I shall happily continue to attend to those details and I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport is considering the matter. As I have said, an announcement will be made on behalf of the Government.

Mr. Hardy: I recognise that the Minister appears to be moving in the direction of concession, but I should like to tie him down just a little. Does he not accept that he needs to consult the Secretary of State for Transport to establish one thing above all—that the Department of Transport, in effect, endorsed the plans for redundancies, which were under way in the passenger transport executives before the Bill received Second Reading? If the Secretary of State for Transport accepts that that was the case, the moral obligation on the Government is unanswerable.

[Mr. Hardy]

Mr. Clarke: Before the hon. Gentleman assumes that I am moving in the direction of concession, I should like to tell him that, for example, to concede new clause 6 would cost about £140 million if it delayed the implementation of the change until April 1987, which it would at the earliest. To concede amendment No. 80 would cost £55 million of public expenditure, if we moved the implementation from August to November. No doubt many other industries would find that they would benefit from rebates if we chose the month of November, and they would not if we chose August. Because of the political position of transport and its position vis-à-vis local authorities and central Government, the south Yorkshire passenger transport executive has its usual ability to beat its way to the Chamber of the House of Commons, unlike other industries.

Nevertheless, what is being said is that it is the Government's policies and the two pieces of legislation that are giving rise to the problem. I have undertaken to do pretty well what the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) repeated — to carry on consultations, which I have already begun, with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. The Government will honour any obligations that it may transpire we have towards the passenger transport authorities. We shall look at the concessions with care.

Hon. Members will want to know at what stage an announcement will be made so that it can be considered. I hope that an announcement will be made on behalf of the Government before consideration begins in another place. On that basis, we can defer the argument and the battle —if there has to be one—about the passenger transport authorities to a later stage. I ask the House to reject the new clause and the amendment, on the narrower point.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

5A.—(1) In the case of any provision contained in an order under section 14 of the 1979 Act and ceasing to have effect (whether wholly or in part) at any time in accordance with section 23 of this Act, the Secretary of State may by order provide, for the purpose of preserving the effect of rights accruing under that provision before that time, for that provision to continue in force as from that time subject to such modifications and transitional provisions as may be specified in the order.

(2) A provision contained in an order under this paragraph may be made with retrospective effect as from the date on which this Act is passed or any later date.

(3) Any order under this paragraph shall be made by statutory instrument which shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.'.—[Mr. Kenneth Clarke.]

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.—[Mr. Kenneth Clarke.]

[Queen's consent and Prince of Wales's consent signified.]

9.49 pm

Mr. Prescott: Of all the Bills that have been brought before the House in the seven years of this Tory Government, this must be the most despicable. By the Government's own admission, it is designed to deregulate and to reduce the wages of people in the lowest paid industries in the country—shops, hotels, restaurants and hairdressing. Previous Tory Governments have felt that there should be laws to prevent exploitation and the development of the sweatshops, which are beginning to emerge.

The Bill dispels any doubt about whether Britain is departing from normal civilised standards. It means that the Government are denouncing international obligations. We will be the only one to do so out of the 94 countries which signed an International Labour Organisation convention recognising that certain trades are poorly organised, poorly paid and liable to exploitation. All the signatory countries agreed to introduce legislation to provide reasonable and fair conditions in those industries but, to our eternal shame, Britain alone has denounced those obligations. It is just another denunciation of international standards. We have done it far more than any other civilised country.

By any criteria, the Bill is mean and despicable. It concentrates all the power of the law against people in the lowest-paid occupations. The Paymaster General knows that we are talking about people who earn £40 or £50 a week. The Bill is designed to drive even those rates further down, as the rejection of our amendments has shown.

The Tories claim to be the party of law and order. They have lectured us all about obeying the law, but there have been very few prosecutions under present legislation for paying miserable wages. The Opposition have proposed amendments which would have strengthened the controls to ensure that agreed rates are enforced, but the Government have rejected those amendments. That is consistent with the 40 per cent. reduction in the number of wages inspectors. Many employers save millions of pounds which they should pay to their employees, by flouting the law.

The Bill is consistent with the Government's approach. They believe that the poor will work harder if they are paid less, but that the wealthy need to be paid more to work harder. It is no wonder that unemployment has increased, as the figures published today show. We are beginning to witness a divided nation. All that rubbish about St. Francis of Assisi when the Prime Minister came into No. 10 should be contrasted with the reality of a divided and bitter nation. The Government are wiping their hands of their responsibilities to provide work and choose to make low pay the solution to our problems.

The Paymaster General paid us a compliment today. The Labour party launched its alternative fair wage strategy yesterday, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman knows that the British people have a sense of fairness and believe that people should have a fair return for their work. They do not want Britain to return to sweat-shop industries and child labour. That is what the Bill is about, however. We are proud to have opposed it. A Labour Government will use the law on behalf of the poor to guarantee them a reasonable standard of living. The House has an obligation to do that, but has flunked it tonight by introducing this pernicious legislation.

Mr. Holt: The Bill on which we are about to pass judgment will abolish the Truck Acts which have existed since 1831 and have been good law for more than 150 years. When they were introduced some hon. Member probably said, "Hurry up. Get on with it, sit down, and let everyone go home," but they have affected the lives of many people during those years.

I have grave reservations about the legislation, especially those parts which refer to industrial tribunals. As the House will know, I have taken a considerable interest in the workings of industrial tribunals, and have spoken many times on the subject. I do not believe that the addition of the nonsense contained in part II to the burden on industrial tribunals will increase the protection of workers. Indeed, in many ways it is a smoke screen which will reduce some of the present protection.

I am not sure that industrial tribunals want that additional responsibility. Since 1961 and trade levies, whenever the Department of Employment has needed to find a repository for anything, it has found one in industrial tribunals, so that today we have case after case on subjects which I am sure it was never dreamt would come before them. I doubt whether those who passed the legislation which set up industrial tribunals for unfair dismissal thought that the tribunals would try the case of a singing rabbi or of a dismissed football manager, yet those are the realms with which they deal. I am worried that, when we initiate such legislation, we do not know how far it will go.

At this stage, hon. Members who have not listened to our debates in Committee or on the Floor of the House have an opportunity to realise the importance of the vote that we are about to hold. The complete abolition of the Truck Acts was not generally canvassed. Indeed, I suspect that most people thought that the Wages Bill would cover wages councils only, and that many hon. Members would not choose to vote for the other aspects of the Bill. Now they are, perhaps, understanding for the first time what it is they are being asked to vote for—the abolition of payment in cash and in the coin of the realm.

Even at this late hour it is important for me to put that on the record, so that someone in the other place may have the wisdom to consider it and prevail on the Government not to pursue this line of enabling everyone to go to an industrial tribunal on what may well be a minor matter. If an employer deducts £6 a week from an employee when he should be deducting only £5, that employee will have, enshrined in legislation, an opportunity to take the matter to an industrial tribunal. In other words, an employee may go to a tribunal for the sake of £1 a week at a cost of thousands of pounds a day for the tribunal. I do not believe that the Government have thought that matter through.

If an employer and employee are in dispute about sums that have been paid or deducted within the areas covered by the Bill, there must be another mechanism to deal with it which is simple, quick and acceptable to both parties. Industrial tribunals are not acceptable to both parties. Employers' organisations and trade union organisations have criticisms of them.

Mr. Nellist: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Do I remember correctly that yesterday you gave a hint, if not a ruling, that those who sought to oppose a ten-minute rule Bill without dividing the House had your displeasure? Does that apply equally to those who seek to speak on Third Reading with no intention of voting against the Bill, as the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) has done for the last three months in Committee?

Mr. Speaker: They are totally different criteria. This is a Third Reading, not a ten-minute rule Bill.

Mr. Holt: The laws of the land are in our hands. People look to us to make good laws. They look to us not to see whether it is time to catch the train home, but to make sure that what we are doing is right. I believe that it is wrong——

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Wages Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour. — [Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

Wages Bill

Question again proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

Mr. Holt: I do not wish to detain the House much longer—[Interruption.] However, I am going to detain the House long enough to make sure that every hon. Member on the Conservative Benches at least knows what he or she is voting for.

I am not sure that everybody has studied in detail the ramifications of what will happen when industrial tribunals are looking into what deductions will be made. I doubt at this stage whether we can manage to read all the documentation that comes to us. We rely on hon. Members who serve in Committee and on experts to help and guide us. I am not satisfied that that has been done in the case of industrial tribunals. I believe that they are over-legalistic, as I have said repeatedly.

I have had a commitment from the Front Bench that the Government will look into the working of industrial tribunals but, instead of doing that, they are adding to the workings. It is on average 13½ weeks before a worker can take a complaint to a tribunal, which is not satisfactory. I think that——

Ms. Clare Short: Boring.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have just passed the 10 o'clock business motion. The hon. Gentleman has a right to be heard.

Mr. Holt: In the last few days, industrial tribunal decisions have been made by the most learned in the land which have overturned quite important previous decisions. I believe that we are opening up a floodgate of legislation in which so-called protection will be given to workers which will not be acceptable in practical terms.

The Government ought to have considered another method to afford the opportunity of a speedy and proper judgment to those who feel they have been disadvantaged. It will not help to impose a delay of 14 to 15 weeks before cases that have a 10 per cent. ceiling on them can come to court. I cannot believe that those who are responsible for advising the Minister have taken this point on board.

In 1965 the number of books on industrial relations to be found on any lawyer's shelf would total one; today they fill the wall. There will soon be a similar increase in the load on the subject of deductions of money from employees.

No area of the business community has asked for this, yet the Government seek to bring it in. We will make a laughing stock of ourselves if we introduce legislation that provides the opportunity for employees to go to an industrial tribunal for what will be trivial sums of money —£3 to £4. It will lead to industrial tribunals having a greater backlog of work, and the whole system will fall into disrepute. I hope that when the Bill goes to the other place, their lordships will, in their wisdom, find an opportunity not to send all these cases to industrial tribunals.

Mr. Penhaligon: Few things deserve more genuine admiration than a Member who dedicates himself to trying to make sure that we understand the legislation on which we shall vote. It is odd in this case that the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) understands the Bill decides that he does not like it, but still will vote for it. The hon. Gentleman's attitude is astonishing, to say the least.

One of the great privileges given to Ministers of the Crown, Secretaries of State and the Paymaster General is the power to protect the vulnerable. That is one of the most honourable and justifying reasons for our system of Government. Since 1909 one of the vulnerable sections has generally been agreed to be the low paid. Repeatedly since 1909 we have tried to protect them from the worst exploitation by wages councils legislation. The Bill removes the most vulnerable part of the low-paid sector from protection—those under 21.

The Minister has made a number of speeches, and we have had a number of debates, but nobody has yet given me satisfactory reason to believe that the abolition of such protection will achieve the objects for which the Minister has argued. He has identified a problem: there are times when paying an 18-year-old the adult rate militates against that young person's opportunity to obtain employment. That calls for a modification of the law on wages councils, not their abolition. However, the Government have decided on abolition.

Nobody can defend a person aged between 16 and 20 from the most outrageous exploitation. The Under-Secretary has failed by allowing the legislation to be put before the House. Given his record on a number of issues, I am surprised that he has done so, because some of us regard him as nearly civilised, compared to the peculiar company that he keeps. I am amazed by what he has done. This is a bad day, and bad legislation. Many people between the ages of 16 and 20 will regret the day that the Bill was passed. They will remember it, and we shall remind them of it.

Any Parliament other than one dominated by a Conservative Government elected by just 42 per cent. of the electorate will bring back some protection for those people.

10.7 pm

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: If we are to maintain the present growth in the economy and in employment opportunities, we have to continue to work at being a modern labour market. The Bill is a useful package of reforms that takes away various obsolete legal requirements, and will improve employment opportunities for a number of people and young people in particular.

I point out to my hon. Friend the Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) that the repeal of the Truck Acts of 1831 is a little overdue, and, if it had been done before today, it would have enabled us to move towards more sensible methods of making payments. We have introduced new protection for those who are liable to deductions from pay in the retail trade, and I do not share his fear about the working of the industrial tribunal system.

By ending the rebate system, we shall be taking off the statute book an outdated law. It is no longer necessary to make it cheaper and easier to make people redundant, and public money can be spent on employment measures in more positive ways.

Our aim is to improve employment opportunities. We are not abolishing wages councils. We are retaining protection for adult workers and making the orders more simple. We are taking away the present complex and sometimes unintelligible rigmarole that surrounds the details of wages orders, whereby every aspect of employment for every employee is fixed by a panel of people in terms that are difficult to apply in practice. We shall still enforce it with the inspectorate, although there will be fewer inspectors because fewer workers will be covered, and the orders will be simpler. The method of enforcing the law will be exactly the same as that used by the previous Government, and so will the style of the wages inspectorate. Labour party spokesmen have argued for an approach to this legislation that they never followed when they were in power.

There has been a welcome reduction in the rate of youth unemployment. During the past three or four years, there has been a reduction in the rate of unemployment among young people compared with the adult rate. That has arisen because we have a more sensible understanding of the relationship between the wages earned by young people in their first jobs out of school and the wages earned by more experienced adults.

The wages councils have no contribution to make in that area. Far from exposing youngsters to risk, we are ensuring that their employment opportunities will be increased.

It is the tradition on Third Reading to make short speeches. Usually the Minister says that this is the finest piece of legislation to pass through the House in modern times. Usually the Labour spokesman says that he cannot, in his entire Parliamentary career, remember a worse case of grinding the faces of the poor. In reality, and considering the contents of the Bill, this is a sensible and, and most cases, a much overdue reform of obsolete bits of present employment law, and I commend it to the House.

Question put, That the Bill be now read the Third time:—

Ambulance Service (Bromley)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

10.21 pm

Mr. John Hunt (Ravensbourne): I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me this opportunity to draw attention to the recent very serious deterioration in Bromley's ambulance service. It is causing great distress and difficulty to many of my constituents. The story that I shall recount to the House is one of muddle and misjudgment by the London ambulance service, which apparently failed to foresee the consequences of its own recent decisions. I was first alerted to the potential problems at the beginning of this year, when a Bromley ambulance man, who is one of my constituents, warned me of the impact of the new rotas that had been agreed between management and the unions.

As a result, I wrote at once to the chairman of the South West Thames regional health authority, which, for reasons not immediately clear to me, administers the whole London ambulance service. At that time, my concern was primarily with emergency cover. In his reply, dated 6 February 1986, the chairman, Mr. Tony Driver, offered me considerable reassurance. He told me, for example, that for some months the authority had been looking into > "A more efficient use of vehicles which would be more responsive to the pattern of demands."

> "There will in fact be an overall increase in emergency cover."

Thus, I was reassured. But of course I had been told only half the story. It subsequently transpired that the cuts were being made not in emergency but non-emergency cover —the walking patients as they are sometimes called.

The cuts were in direct contradiction to specific assurances that had been given to my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims), who has also been actively engaged in these matters, but who is unfortunately overseas on parliamentary business tonight. My hon. Friend received a letter dated 25 February from the chief officer of the London ambulance service, in which he was told that special funding was being provided to meet the situation. As far as I am aware, no such funding has been made available.

It was about that time that I and other of my hon. Friends who represent constituencies in the borough of Bromley began to receive complaints from our constituents about the numerous cancellations and delays within the local ambulance service. I therefore wrote again to Mr. Driver on 22 April expressing some surprise that I had not been forewarned of the reductions, and telling him of their disastrous impact on my constituents.

At about the same time, the district general manager of Bromley health authority, Mr. P. A. Ward, wrote in similar terms to the regional general manager of the South-West Thames RHA. Mr. Ward expressed his serious concern at what he called "the sudden and unplanned" reduction in Bromley's ambulance service. His letter highlighted the draconian cuts that were being imposed.

Apparently, the original demand from the London ambulance service had been for an immediate reduction of 40 per cent. in non-emergency patients. That in itself was bad enough, but by April the position had become immeasurably worse — a demand was made by the divisional ambulance officer for a reduction not of 40 per cent. but of 70 per cent. in the service for walking patients. That represents a reduction in coverage from 513 patients a week to 163. It was, therefore, hardly surprising that the many patients affected were up in arms and wrote, and are still writing, to me and other Members of Parliament.

I wish to quote one letter from a young lady living in Hayes in my constituency. She said

"I am writing to you about the ambulance cut backs. I am disabled and used to go to Guy's hospital in London by ambulance but I have been told that due to cut backs I cannot have transport any more. The hospital has tried to get me transport and so has my own doctor, but it has been to no avail, so I can't go to the hospital any more. I can't walk very far. I have arthritis in my legs and my hands."

That young girl of 23 is clearly suffering greatly.

In Bromley, ambulance service support has been withdrawn from the Phoenix centre for physically and mentally handicapped children at Farnborough hospital. That centre does magnificent work in providing therapeutic treatment for more than 20 severely handicapped children from all parts of the borough. Surely their parents have enough to cope with without the additional strain of having to make individual travel arrangements for them every day.

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Croydon, North-West): I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware of the immensely successful hospital in Croydon, the Mayday, and the fantastic work that it does. However, is he aware that many consultants at the hospital have approached myself and other hon. Members representing Croydon constituencies because they are concerned about the effectiveness of the London ambulance service? They are worried about the problems with the service in the Croydon area.

Mr. Hunt: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, because his intervention emphasises how widespread the problem is. I do not wish in any way to suggest that it is confined only to Bromley; I know that it goes very much wider than that.

Another example in Bromley is the Stepping Stones club, which provides facilities for patients who are recovering from mental and other illnesses. Only this morning I received a letter from the chairman of the Bromley Council for Voluntary Service, His Honour Judge David Griffiths, expressing his concern at the withdrawal of ambulance service support. Part of his letter reads:

"There appears to be severe cuts in ambulance service or community care and yet it appears to be Government policy to increase and encourage this very type of service."

That emphasises a policy contradiction in what is happening.

I have seen a copy of a letter sent by a distinguished ophthalmic surgeon in Bromley to various health authorities and hospitals expressing his great concern at the effect of the cuts on his patients. A section of his letter reads:

"a high proportion of our patients are old and unable to use public transport, and unfortunately many of them have no relatives living locally and appear to have no neighbours who are able to help and hence rely entirely on the ambulance service to attend outpatients."

The letter continues:

"As you will appreciate, these patients include those with long-term conditions, such as glaucoma, which need to be kept under review. There are also post-operative patient and it is essential we see these patients as required at the outpatient clinics. If they cannot attend I can foresee that inevitably there will be disasters with regard to their treatment which could lead to diminution or even loss of their vision which would not be rectifiable."

That is what is happening in Bromley. It is inhuman and intolerable. Faced with this crisis, I am bound to say that I regard the response of the London ambulance service as both casual and complacent. I can only describe the most recent reply that I received from the chairman of the South West Thames regional health authority to my latest letter of protest as quite remarkable. I shall quote two sections of it. He wrote:

"The London Ambulance Service has been faced with an almost impossible task since March as the introduction of the new structure had to be subject to a free vote of all ambulancemen before we, as the managers, would know whether it should be introduced and, following from that, the extent to which ambulancemen would then be willing to undertake over-time if required, could not have been foreseen."

Surely any competent and responsible ambulance authority would never have embarked upon a new structure of working until it had assessed the full impact of the new rotas upon the patients that it is there to serve. Mr. Driver's letter continues:

"When the introduction of the new salaried structure was decided, we and the LAS between us wrote both to Regional and District General Managers throughout London pointing out that in the short-term the imbalance between need and availability could only be matched if the number of patient journeys could be radically reduced. The impact of this on individual patients was a matter which was largely in the hands of the Health Authorities themselves, since they alone can restrict demand."

It seems that that comment begs the question why it was necessary to restrict demand in the first place. I think that that was dodging the issue. A major miscalculation has been made and now Mr. Driver tells me that the London ambulance service is hoping to recruit more men, and perhaps women, to fill the gaps in the present provision.

I ask my hon. Friend the Minister three specific questions. First, when will the shortfall be made up? Secondly, is the recruitment of the additional ambulance men subject to any financial restraint or cash limit? Thirdly, when will the 70 per cent. cut in non-emergency provision in Bromley be restored?

I came into politics, as I am sure my hon. Friend did, to improve the lot of those whom I represented. Cuts in ambulance provision of this nature and magnitude, cruelly affecting the most vulnerable sections of the community, make a mockery of all that I have been seeking to do throughout my period in public life. I beg my hon. Friend to act, and to act quickly, to restore the qualities of care and compassion both to the London ambulance service and to our Government.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Ravensbourne (Mr. Hunt) for the opportunity to respond to what is clearly an important matter. I was already well aware of the strength of his feeling on the subject, but he has reinforced my impression of his deep concern. I am grateful also for the opportunity to respond to the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, North-West (Mr. Malins). I accept, too, that he is disturbed about what has been happening to the ambulance service for his own constituents.

I must say, at the outset, that we recognise that there have been problems and indeed, in some cases, serious problems, and improvements must be made. I hope that I shall give my hon. Friends some reason for believing and hoping that those improvements are now in train. Certainly, positive things are happening.

I shall attempt, initially, to set the whole effort in context. These days, we hear far too much about expenditure cuts in the National Health Service. As my hon. Friends the Members for Croydon, North-West and for Ravensbourne recognise, the National Health Service is enjoying a significant increase in resources—a 24 per cent. increase in real terms since 1979.

We recognise that the pressures on the service have increased because of its success. Factors such as the ageing population, our success in making medical advances, and the additional number of nurses and doctors we have recruited all put pressure on the service. The issue also involves the operation of the resource allocation working party, which is known as RAWP.

However, tonight we are talking about the ambulance service. Since the Conservative party came to office it has increased ambulance service expenditure by almost 10 per cent. in real terms. Some of the increase has been shared by the London ambulance service, to which my hon. Friends referred, as it covers Bromley and Croydon.

A new salaried structure for ambulance men and women was introduced recently. The objective of the development was to lead to a more efficient and effective service which was more sensitive to the needs of patients. It was welcomed not only by the management side but by the trade union side of the ambulance Whitley council. There was no intention that the new salaried structure should reduce the level of service provided to the general public as a consequence of the agreement. The purpose of the salaried structure was to replace a pay system which encouraged inefficient working practice.

Both management and the trade unions recognised the importance of reducing overtime to the absolute minimum necessary for operational purposes, and the need to eradicate other working practices which frustrated the establishment of a more cost-effective and efficient ambulance service. The "all-in" salary replaced the former system under which the basic rate of pay was substantially enhanced by additional payments for overtime, shift and weekend working. In many services, but not in the London ambulance services, bonus payments were also made. Now, the basic rate covers all payments for a standard working week worked round the clock and seven days a week as operational needs may require.

The national agreement provided management with the opportunity to review critically, for example, the level of accident and emergency cover to ensure that the level provided matched that indicated by operational need. It provided for rotas to be reviewed and, where necessary, changed, using the criterion that operational necessity is the basis for staff being on duty. The agreement also encouraged the development of extended training in certain life-saving techniques. Out-patient and day centre arrangements were also to be reviewed and altered to provide the optimum vehicle and manpower utilisation. The agreement provides, too, a commitment for working practices to be kept under continuing review and for changes to be made where indicated.

Our constituency experience over the years has shown us there have been serious inefficiencies and waste in the Health Service. I am certain that our basic principle, which was carefully worked out with specialist experts who were brought in to advise, is the right way to go. There is no doubt, however, that there have been problems. The national agreement on salaried status was expected to result in major changes in the organisation and delivery of ambulance services and to lead to an improved service to patients, which is what we seek. There have been teething troubles. Although we are not resigned to that, the problems might be regarded as not particularly surprising. Regrettably, this has been happening in London recently and in other parts of the country.

The London ambulance service management has reviewed its working arrangements and reached local agreement with the staff about the changes necessary to provide the level of service it considered appropriate. It decided that there was a need to divert more resources to the emergency side of the ambulance service. My hon. Friend the Member for Ravensbourne recognised that. I am sure that he agrees that, when difficult decisions have to be taken, the emergency service must take priority.

The changes effected will improve response and activation times and demonstrably provide an improved service which will be of direct benefit to patients. That must be good news. I believe that it will be welcomed by all hon. Members.

This improvement in the emergency service has, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ravensbourne pointed out, had the unfortunate effect of reducing the manpower available to carry out non-emergency duties. We believe that that is a temporary phenomenon. Active steps have been taken to recruit additional staff. Of course, new staff need to be trained to enable them to carry out these important duties. I am pleased to report—I respond to some of the questions put to me by my hon. Friend—that the London ambulance service has been able to recruit 65 new staff who are currently being trained and who will all be available between now and the end of June to carry out operational duties. Further recruitment is taking place and another 32 staff will start training at the beginning of June. The London ambulance service management is encouraged by the response to the recruitment campaign. As an interim measure, the LAS is making use also of the hospital car service, taxis and other hire cars. It has offered district health authorities the loan of ambulances, together with the cash for drivers if suitable people can be recruited locally.

On this issue, it is not a question of money. The Thames regional health authorities have made available additional resources to enable a level of service considered appropriate to be provided. This has taken account of continuing growth in demand for ambulance services, but, of course, this is an aspect in which everyone can help. There is frequently abuse of the ambulance service. I acknowledge that the Health Service has a responsibility to provide the best and most effective service it can. But those responsible for ordering ambulances, and the public have a responsibility to ensure that requests are made only for transport for those patients who meet the medical need criterion. Patients travelling to hospital by public or private transport who receive supplementary benefit or who are on a low income are entitled to reimbursement of their fares.

We regret the inconvenience and distress caused to patients who had their transport cancelled, particularly when they had no time to make alternative arrangements. We believe that the situation should now be improving and that it will continue to do so as the new staff gradually come on stream. Coupled with the real improvement that has already taken place in the quality of the emergency service in London, I am sure that this demonstrates that, within the resources available, our determination remains clear to provide the best ambulance service possible for London and for my hon. Friend's constituents. I should be grateful if my hon. Friend will convey my regret to his constituents about what has happened so far. However, I believe that the outlook with respect to the non-emergency services is improving in the directions I have mentioned. Certainly, the emergency services have improved. I hope that the new arrangement and the new salaried structure will benefit not only ambulancemen but, what at the end of the day is infinitely the most important, the Health Service patients—our constituents.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at sixteen minutes to Eleven o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 16 May 1986

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITION

Social Security Reform

9.35 am

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): I beg to ask leave to present a petition on behalf of the constituents of Brent, South who are profoundly concerned about the changes that are taking place in the socal benefits scheme.

The Brent Association for the Disabled is especially worried, as it appears that legislation passing through the House might disadvantage more than 100 of its members. It is apt that the petition should be presented this morning, because next week the House will consider these matters. Although the legislation will inevitably go through, perhaps some of the anxieties expressed by people throughout the country will be calmed on Report, and perhaps the legislation will help a few of those who will be dispossessed.

The petition sheweth

That the legislation based on the "Reform of Social Security —the Programme for Action" White Paper—which was the start of the Bill—will be extremely detrimental to the residents of the United Kingdom who are in receipt of social security benefits. Wherefore your petitioners pray that your Honourable House do not pass legislation arising out of the "Reform of Social Security" White Paper. And your petitoners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Inner Cities

9.37 am

Mr. John Heddle (Mid-Staffordshire): I beg to move,

That this House recognises the need for a partnership between the private and public sectors in the context of urban renewal and in particular for private investment in the inner cities, specifically to widen the choice on behalf of inner city residents to offer them the right to buy and the right to rent, to make the best use of existing urban resources so as to provide the best opportunities for better schools, better job opportunities, to make the best use of existing real estate and personal resources, and to help to conserve the amentities and countryside around the conurbations.

On about the seventh anniversary of my election to the House I had come to the conclusion that I would serve out the rest of my time here without achieving success in the ballot for private Members' Bills or for private Members' motions. However, as at constituency cocktail party raffles in the past, now and again one's number comes up.

I am probably the least numerate Member of the House. I did not manage to pass even O-level mathematics. I cannot remember the size of the majority that I was fortunate enough to secure in Mid-Staffordshire at the previous election, but when balloting for private Members' motions I have always picked the number in the ballot book that represents the majority that I had to beat to become Member of Parliament for Lichfield and Tamworth in 1979. That majority was 331. By a quirk of fate, this was the 13th occasion on which I had balloted in this Parliament for a private Member's motion. I give that advice to my hon. Friends and to Opposition Members should they at some time want their numbers to come up.

These are not just any old numbers—331 and 13, unlucky for some. One might say that, one in three or three in one, the motion refers to a trinity. Let us hope that the solution to the problems of inner cities can be found in some trinity or co-operation between the three major political parties.

It is therefore with some regret that I have to record that one of those political parties, the alliance, is not represented in the Chamber today. There is no representative of the Liberal party and no representative of the Social Democratic party. I find that most extraordinary, because the Liberal spokesman for the environment is the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), who represents a borough which probably has some of the worst inner-city problems. I also find it extraordinary that the Liberal Chief Whip is not here, for he represents a constituency in Liverpool, a city which is often represented by a Liberal majority in the city hall. Perhaps we might consider whether the problem that politicians in town halls, county halls or here in Whitehall have inherited in the inner cities is due to the stranglehold—I shall not say ecclesiastical freehold, but certainly fiefhold—of town halls by one major political party.

I have, as is customary in debates such as this, to declare two interests. One is possibly pecuniary, and the other is most certainly honorary. The pecuniary one is that I am a consultant to a firm of chartered surveyors, as, I believe, is well known, and there is just a possibility, although I know not of it, that that firm will from time to time act for companies which have interests in urban renewal and inner-city deprivation. The honorary interest is as a vice-president of the Building Societies Association, which I believe to be a more significant interest, in that it is possible that human life will be revived in inner cities by a tranfusion from the public sector to the private sector, embodied by the ownership of property by building societies and other similar institutions.

Urban deprivation defies definition. It shares that quality with the elephant, just as it does the quality of being huge and obvious. Urban decay is not just about crumbling out-of-date buildings, old age, poverty, and litter; it is about densities of under-privilege, squalor, concentrations of relatively poor people housed inadequately in areas of declining economic activity, rising unemployment, crime and vandalism. It is not necessarily a matter of physical location, because many inner cities are relatively prosperous.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heddle: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to continue my speech for a little longer. I shall then be delighted to give way to him. I respect the hon. Gentleman very much, and I know that he nurses his Liverpool constituency with great assiduity.

The inner-city problem is about concentrations of social deprivation and economic decline. It is not so much about no-go areas as about no-hope areas. Last Saturday, while queueing for admission to Wembley stadium, my 10-year-old son and I were attacked and robbed of our tickets. What happened in broad daylight in the midst of the madding crowd happens every day and every night in the graffiti-ridden liftshafts of hard-to-let council flats and in the dark, dank alleyways that meander through the inner cities. Unlike what happened last Saturday, the innocent who are robbed of their handbags, shopping baskets or wallets go unreported in the press and unreported to the police. Such things are part of every-day inner-city life, but they should not be.

Why do such incidents not occur in the leafy suburbs or the neo-Georgian estates on the fringes of our prosperous towns? It is surely that people there are better behaved, and partly because they are better housed and therefore the more content with their lives.

Mr. Parry: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on raising this important subject. Does he agree that many of the problems arising from the serious decline of our inner cities have come about because of Government policy? I refer to unemployment, rate capping and large cuts in rate support grant.

Mr. Heddle: I do not regret having given way to the hon. Gentleman, because he has revealed the one-sided and blinkered attitude from which I had hoped the debate would get away. He concentrated on the largesse of the Government and the ability of the Treasury or Whitehall to provide the solution to the nation's problems. I hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House will be prepared to admit today that the solution to the inner-city problem as embodied in my motion lies in partnership between the public and private sectors. There should be a certain amount of financial pump-priming from the taxpayer, and a certain amount of initiative and enterprise from the private sector.

Is the answer to the inner-city problem as simple as the hon. Member for Liverpool, Riverside (Mr. Parry) suggested? Is more cash from the public purse the answer? Is the answer to build more council houses? Has homelessness in Liverpool decreased, while the hon. Gentleman has served his constituents, by building more council houses? The answer is no. Homelessness has continued to increase, partly because the existing housing stock, public and private, has not been used to the best advantage of the community.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Fulham): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that during the past five years or so there has been an unprecedented increase in homelessness to levels that we have never before experienced, and that for the first time since the war there has been a reduction in the public sector housing stock? Is he aware that those two phenomena have gone hand in hand?

Mr. Heddle: I listened to the hon. Gentleman's maiden speech some weeks ago with considerable interest and found some of it contradictory. Despite his few weeks in the House, he has already acquired what so many hon. Members have—the disease of selective amnesia. As he was a prominent activist in the voluntary housing movement, he will know that the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 has done as much to increase homelessness as anything else. I shall come to that and to bed-and-breakfast accommodation later.

The problems of inner cities reflect acutely the difficulties that the Government have identified in their national strategy as being behind Britain's long-term problems—excessive or misdirected central and local government spending, the intrusion of controls into inappropriate areas and the stifling of enterprise. The inner cities present the best possible example of those problems in action and of the dereliction of industry and unemployment that they have helped to create.

The advice that the Government receive from the Opposition parties boils down to a bid for a greater share of public expenditure, an increased burden on the taxpayer or the ratepayer, or all three. Bids and proposals must be judged according to whether they repeat the mistakes of the past, whether they encourage initiative and discourage dependency and whether they encourage good targeting and value for money. Those are the key issues.

Is it not the case that were it not for the riots in 1980 and 1985 the inner cities would have featured far less on the agenda of the House than they do? All political parties, of whatever persuasion and hue, must bear some responsibility for the fact that for generations they have ignored the decline that has taken place behind the corrugated and nettle-ridden boundary fences of vacant land and in buildings which are rated but are unused because they have outlived their usefulness. All political parties have a responsibility for the inheritance that is ours today.

I pay tribute to my right hon. Friends the Members for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), for Bridgwater (Mr. King) and for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker) for the initiative that they and their ministerial teams have taken in trying to provide solutions to problems which have been conveniently ignored by all political parties for so long.

It would be wrong to relate inner-city decline simply to state intervention. However, it is clear that fundamental and expensive mistakes have been made in tackling urban problems. The initiatives on basic needs and attacks on abuses have all too often mushroomed into an overblown machinery which sought to plan, take responsibility for, rehabilitate and regulate everything. All too often the basic dynamic of wealth creation has been taken for granted, resulting in the failure that we see today.

The lessons from the past suggest the following strategy. Assistance should be targeted on the most needy areas, where results can be seen, so that help is not spread too thinly and incoherently. We should require the state, especially local authorities, to minimise regulations and to be responsive and positive to investors and consumers. We should build up business confidence by tackling dereliction, and by pump-priming investment in infrastructure. That is most important, because the private sector will not invest shareholders' capital or risk its capital or profits in the inner cities unless the Government are prepared to provide the infrastructure. That is part of the formula of the partnership to which I referred earlier. We should provide direct help to businesses, to encourage badly needed investment, such as is happening in docklands and the Albert dock in the constituency of the hon. Member for Riverside. That is a fine example of partnership between the public and private sectors, revitalising, refurbishing and renewing life in his part of that sadly neglected city.

It is self-evident that many Departments must be involved in that task. One of the problems of the past is, perhaps, that there has not been an umbrella authority or Department which can take an overview of all the components that make up inner-city deprivation. The Home Office deals with issues such as law and order and race discrimination, the Department of Employment deals with employment and training, the Department of Education and Science deals with education, and the Department of Health and Social Security deals with social services. All those matters are as important as bad housing and a lack of business opportunities. No one Department has ever been able to pull all those various components together. That is why the initiative taken to try out employment-based projects in eight selected small inner-city areas is so important. It is another example of the Government's willingness and open-mindedness to test projects to ensure that public money is properly spent and that all opportunities to secure inner-city regeneration are properly explored.

Local labour markets should work efficiently. That means encouraging young people in the inner cities to make the most of their training opportunities, and making them realise that, although those opportunities may not be as profitable in terms of pocket money as unemployment benefit, they should take the advantage of learning a skill which will stand them in good stead for a job later on. It means encouraging realistic wage expectations and improving the information and recruitment systems which match people to jobs in a way which gives everybody a fair chance.

Job prospects in the inner cities will not depend wholly on those labour supply measures alone. We must improve the physical fabric in order to encourage private investment which generates jobs. At the end of my speech I shall make some constructive suggestions which my right hon. and hon. Friends in their Departments have not yet taken on board in as encouraging a manner as I would hope. We must ensure that land in the inner cities is open to developers. Above all, we must do something about the social mix in the cities. There must be home ownership beside rented property, and large factories beside small seed corn nursery industrial units. We cannot afford the one-tenure municipal ghettos for residential, commercial or industrial purposes which tie people in their choice of housing and job, lock them into immobility, and give them no opportunity to change their job, either from one part of the city to another, or from one part of the country to another.

I am looking forward to the reply of my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment. She had a long and distinguished record in local government before coming to the House, and, like many hon. Members, she can see the problem from both sides — from the town hall and from Whitehall. The Department of the Environment is most concerned about the development of urban policy, fully recognising that many Departments' programmes are necessarily involved, and it is to that that my hon. Friend lends her experience.

Too often, the arguments about how much money should be given to local authorities are given publicity. The hon. Member for Riverside referred to that earlier. I do not want to go into that today, but I wish to emphasise that that debate obscures the range of policies and policy instruments which are being used to regenerate our inner cities. Perhaps I could remind the House of some of them.

Those policies include selective and targeted support, both through the urban programme and through many local authorities' programmes. My hon. Friend the Minister will probably tell the House of the enormous sums that have been invested in those schemes, but we must ask whether that money has been properly invested on behalf of taxpayers to produce the best benefit for the people who live in those areas. There is the policy to mobilise the inner-city land market and to tackle dereliction through the land registers and the dereliction land programme, enlisting the support of the private sector through urban development grants and the new urban regeneration grant. There is the policy to improve inner-city housing by widening choice and encouraging both owner-occupation and a more responsive and efficient service to tenants.

There are 188,000 acres of derelict land waiting for the developer's digger and the builder's shovel to lay foundations for homes and factories to buy and to rent. The procedure to identify that land is too cumbersome, because the information is locked in a register which is put on display at the behest of the local authority which owns the land and which, by and large, does not wish to sell it. I am not making a party political point, as local authorities controlled by all political parties have been guilty of that discouraging inertia. Local authorities like to acquire land, but do not wish to dispose of it.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): The House is listening with great interest to a fascinating exposition of inner-city problems. My hon. Friend mentioned local authorities as being one of the culprits of land hoarding. Does he agree that it is not just local authorities, but many of the public institutions, such as the water authorities and British Rail, which continue with this hoarding? Does the Government's register not show that the number of acres of derelict, vacant and dormant land in public hands is increasing, and that something much more dramatic needs to be done to allow that land to come into use, rather than permit green field site developments on the outside? As long as the inner city is left empty, with vacant dormant land in public ownership, the developers will wish to develop on the green field sites outside.

Mr. Heddle: My hon. Friend has made a valid and telling point. He had the experience, in a previous Parliament, of representing an inner city seat in Liverpool. The principal culprit of land hoarding is local authorities and certain statutory undertakings, possibly the DHSS. However, now that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health and Social Services has appointed Mr. Victor Paige as chairman of the National Health Service management board, that has injected an attitude of greater urgency into the management of properties owned by the Department and the regional health authorities.

My hon. Friend then spoke about the water authorities, and they have been guilty of holding much too much land. He also mentioned British Rail, and here I pay tribute to the managing director of the British Rail property board, Mr. Gavin Simpson, whom I have the pleasure of knowing, and who has embarked on a constructive and progressive policy towards the disposal of surplus sidings and other land which British Rail has hoarded for years to store coal, but which has not been used since the advent of the electric train. I agree with what my hon. Friend said.

My hon. Friend then referred to the maximisation of inner-city land as being the one way to relieve pressure on the green belt. We could spend many hours debating this point. I pay tribute to the House Builders Federation, to the Building Employers Confederation and the British Property Federation, which, more recently than some of us might have hoped, have taken on board the fact that the only way to satisfy builders' land requirements is for them to turn their attention from Bracknell to Beckton, from the leafy suburbs of the M4 corridor back to the inner cities.

The one way to revitalise the inner cities is to encourage people to want to live there. I suspect that the majority of people now buying property in docklands had hoped, when they left school or university, that they would spend the majority of their family lives living in the suburbs or the country. Because of the initiative that we can see at docklands, again a partnership between the public and the private sectors, that rundown place, an area which we have all neglected for the past 20 years—[Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) wishes to intervene, he is welcome to do so. He represents a constituency not far from docklands. Perhaps he could give the House the benefit of his views, rather than whispering to the hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Raynsford).

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I did not intervene immediately because I had only just walked in to the Chamber—I apologise to the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) and to other hon. Members. I thought that it would be impertinent of me immediately to intervene, but as the hon. Member has invited me to do so, I shall take the opportunity.

The prices of houses being built in the south part of my borough of Newham, in the London Docklands Development Corporation area, are beyond the financial range of the vast majority of the ordinary people of Newham. That problem must be faced. It is all very well to talk of houses at £50,000 or £60,000, but the people of Newham cannot afford them.

Mr. Heddle: The hon. Gentleman has made a valid point and one to which the Government must devote their mind. The hon. Gentleman has experience of east London, at both local and central Government levels, and he can make some constructive suggestions. It is a problem for all political parties which seek to revitalise areas, whether inner city or otherwise, that those areas will become more attractive to the upwardly mobile, which will inevitably price out the people who we wish to house first and foremost—the young, the disadvantaged and those on low incomes. This challenge confronts us all, and the answer does not lie simply in public sector housing. If it did, docklands would not have been what it was before it was revitalised. It does not lie solely in the free market, because that would produce, as the hon. Gentleman says, the price escalation that we have seen in docklands.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Is not the massive escalation in house and land prices also pricing out housing associations and other third-sector agencies which would wish to develop the sort of partnership which the hon. Gentleman is suggesting, and which I support? Given the urgency of the task and the speed with which things are developing, the only way to control the otherwise excessive increases in land prices in the development areas is to intervene to hold down those prices, so that there can be an opportunity for housing associations, or even low-cost private housing, and for local authorities to regenerate the area for the local community. Is this not the priority for the people who live in the most deprived areas of London and Liverpool?

Mr. Heddle: I cannot entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman. At the beginning of my speech I referred to the fact that the hon. Gentleman was not in his place. I am delighted that he is now with us. He may have come in late because of the traffic holding him up on the M25 as he decided to skirt round his constituency. It may be because he picked up the speech to which the House will no doubt enjoy listening later from his research assistant. I do not know, but the House always listens with great interest to the hon. Gentleman's contributions. However, I do not agree with him, because while the housing associations may wish to develop in docklands, they could buy the accommodation elsewhere. Those whom the housing associations wish to satisfy would be prepared to live elsewhere in the inner cities, in areas where land is at giveaway, knockdown, auction prices.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): Rubbish.

Mr. Heddle: It is not rubbish. There are about 180,000 acres of inner city land of which the value is negligible because nobody in the private sector wants to buy it because they cannot afford to put in the infrastructure. The only way to get that land developed is by giving derelict land grants.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): I hate to break up this cosy view of the term "inner cities" being applied only to London. If the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) is talking about inner cities rather than about one inner city, he should realise that the problem of tremendous pressure for development in the city does not exist in the Manchesters, the Liverpools or most of the northern cities. There is no pressure there from the leafy suburbs for land. We should be delighted to have that problem.

Mr. Heddle: The hon. Gentleman states only half the case. The pressure may not be from the leafy suburbs or the green belt land, but—he ignores this at his political peril — it is there from those on the council house waiting lists who go to his advice bureau every Friday and Saturday, as they come to mine, to demand the right to a home. The problem there is not the right to buy, but the right to rent.

Investing in the inner cities is not like investing down the M4 corridor, as the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) reminded us. The risks are greater and the returns more uncertain, and therein lies the challenge to the Government—to try to find an incentive to bring private capital back to the inner cities.

Without doubt, the right to buy has been a considerable success, as has been acknowledged across the Chamber. It has been such a success that the Opposition will go into the next election—no doubt reluctantly—unprepared to oppose such legislation. I should like the alliance parties, which are in power in so many town halls at the moment, instead of obstructing the legal process positively to encourage tenants to buy their houses.

When I served on the Standing Committee of the Housing Bill in 1980, I was delighted to learn that the Opposition were prepared to give a fair wind to the assured tenancy arrangements. They knew, as I knew, that assured tenancies would not produce very many houses, because there is no correlation between cost and economic rent. The hon. Member for Fulham nods in a north-south direction. He agrees with me. Therefore, I ask him also to agree with me that if the assured tenancy provisions are, in principle, acceptable to his party, the shorthold provisions of the Housing Act 1980 should also be acceptable to his party.

The assured tenancy provisions were designed to provide new homes for rent by people who want to rent their homes. The shorthold tenancy provisions were also designed to provide new and/or secondhand homes for people who want to rent their homes. It is not for the Opposition to say that people should live in new houses or in secondhand houses. It is up to Opposition Members to try to find practical solutions to these problems.

Mr. Raynsford: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that both the assured tenancy and the shorthold tenancy experiments have proved to be completely irrelevant? The problem, as the hon. Gentleman recognises—and that is why I was nodding—is that the economics of trying to provide rented housing which will give a return to the landlord and be within the reach of ordinary people on low incomes who are looking for rented housing are impossible. There is a gross mismatch. That applies whether one is referring to short tenancies or to any other form of tenancy where rent control does not apply. Where rent control applies, the tenant may be able to afford the accommodation, but the landlord will not find that it is an attractive proposition. Again that highlights the mismatch.

Our objection to the shorthold scheme is that when the Government introduced it they gave pledges about rent control, but then they promptly tried to remove rent security from tenants so that landlords could charge what they want. It is a grossly misconceived scheme. It is irrelevant to housing needs, it is a sad comment on the Government's pledge to revive the private market and it has been wholly illusory and unsuccessful.

Mr. Heddle: I regret having given way for a second time this morning to the hon Gentleman, and I shall not give way to him again. I shall read his speech with interest during the early part of next week, if I can find the time. He has blurred the edges between rent control and security of tenure. They are two separate and distinct issues. He has also allowed himself the privilege of putting himself into the minds of homeless persons. He should not come to the House and presume to know whether somebody would like the right to rent for one, two, three, four or five years.

It is not for the Opposition to say, as they said during the Committee stage of the Housing Bill, that if they are returned to power they will repeal the shorthold provisions. The public perception of that promise is that if the Opposition are returned to power people will find that they are homeless, or landlords will find that they have unsatisfactory tenants and that it is difficult to evict them. The debate continues about the right to rent. The Opposition have travelled down the road to Damascus over the question of the right to buy. I hope the time will come when they travel down the same road over the right to rent.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heddle: No, I shall not give way again. I have already given way on several occasions and I must finish my speech.

Today there are 1 million people who want the right to a key to their own front door. There are a considerable number of empty houses, many of which, although by no means all, are owned by local authorities. Some of the local authority-owned houses have been empty for six, nine, 12, or more months. Today 26,000 houses that are under stewardship of local authorities have been standing empty for more than 12 months. That is a scandal and a scar on the face of a so-called caring society. If one looks above the fascia boards of shop fronts in towns and cities throughout the country, one sees empty rooms. [Interruption.] Local authorities will not let these rooms, for the very reason that the hon. Member for Fulham mentioned. [Interruption.] He is as much responsible for homelessness and for the misery that homelessness causes as anybody else. His partial, irresponsible, sedentary remarks will not, I hope, Mr. Deputy Speaker, be recorded in Hansard.

Mr. Raynsford: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heddle: I suggest that any local authority house that stands empty for more than six months, on the excuse that the local authority is waiting to carry out repairs or that it does not have enough money with which to carry out the repairs, should be made available on a rent-free basis to a do-it-yourself expert on the local authority's housing waiting list. Hundreds of my constituents who come to my advice bureau or who write to me would like to have the key to a house that needs gentrification and to be able to do that work out of their own resources in return for a generous rent-free period. It would help them to secure a home. It would also help local authorities. They would not have to look after empty houses that are an open invitation to vandals. Furthermore, the local authorities would not have to provide the money to rehabilitate those houses.

The way in which to regenerate the inner cities is to provide a partnership between the public and the private sector in the business context, the way forward must be to encourage the great corporations of this country and abroad to put more than the 0·1 per cent. of their pre-tax profits into inner city regeneration. If that can happen at Baltimore in the United States, it can happen in the United Kingdom. It could happen through the provision of tax exempt bonds, a matter which I should like to discuss further with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and his team.

[Mr. Heddle]

For those who are prepared to provide job opportunities in the inner cities by starting up their own small, seed corn factories, but who do not have the track record to be able to obtain premises with which to do so, I should like a covenant guarantee to be introduced under which either the Government or the local authorities would be prepared to pay or guarantee the rent for a period. That would enable people to start up in business and ultimately play their part in providing job opportunities.

I should like local authorities to pass their hard-to-let estates to the private sector and to building societies and other financial institutions, and, instead of being responsible for the cost of management and maintenance, to guarantee the rent. They would then not have to worry about maintenance and capital costs. All that they would have to do would be to guarantee any shortfall. Local authorities have to fund that shortfall anyway, because of their stewardship of our housing stock. Today the nation's rent debt bill stands at £200 million. If local authorities were to guarantee the rent to another landlord instead of having the responsibility for management and maintenance costs, that figure would not be as horrendously high as it is today.

I should like the umbrella concept to be introduced so that Whitehall Departments do not have to vie with each other to find solutions to our horrendous inner city problems. I should like a national urban task force to be established, along the lines of the Scottish Development Agency, which seems to work very well. That agency would be not Government-led, but would be business-led. The players in that development agency would be orchestrated by enterprise and incentive.

Mr. Parry: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heddle: No, I am reaching the end of my speech. I ask the hon. Gentleman to be patient, because I am sure that he will seek to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in a moment.

The players would be orchestrated in that development agency by enterprise and incentive. The principal players would be the Department of the Environment, builders, developers, institutions, industry and the building societies.

I submit that those are the ways in which to reverse the failures in our cities. That is the way in which to provide jobs and decent housing for the residents of our cities. We must break the cycle of dependency and challenge the assumption which too often underlies the approach of some local authorities—the production of a high cost and sophisticated municipal welfare system which too often benefits the provider of the system rather than the consumer. That is the way forward.

I urge my hon. Friend to continue to seek effective ways of partnership to provide a way out of the present difficulties and certainly not ways which reinforce them. The role of the private sector will be central to that process and will be of growing and not diminishing importance. If our cities are once again to be human, safer, prosperous and the pride of our nation, I commend to the House some of the suggestions which my motion embodies.

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): I am sure that hon. Members have listened with great interest to the speech of the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle). We congratulate him on tabling the motion, which gives us the opportunity to develop some of the comments that he has made. Equally, it enables us to comment in depth on some of the issues that he did not touch upon. Those of us who come from the inner cities know at first hand the problmes that exist and a debate such as this is our opportunity to highlight them in the House.

On some things I am in agreement with the hon. Gentleman but on other matters we have very little in common. I think that all hon. Members would accept that in all areas of government, be it local or national, we must try to obtain the best services for the money that is being spent. No one would disagree with that. However, those of us who come from the inner cities see another side to the problem and the hon. Gentleman has not touched on that in any great detail.

The comments that many hon. Members will make today were vividly reported in the recent Church of England report "Faith in the City". It clearly outlined the kind of day-to-day issues that people who live in our inner cities, not just London, have to live with.

I want to comment on some of the issues which affect my constituency in London and which affect many hon. Members who represent London, irrespective of the side of the Chamber on which they sit. The first issue is, undoubtedly, employment. Government policy on employment in the inner cities has completely failed. One can see from any opinion poll that the great concern that people have is trying to find employment. In my post today have come the latest figures in the Manpower Services Commission report, "Unemployment and unfilled vacancies in Wandsworth", dated April 1986. One assumes that they are up-to-date figures. In the borough for which I am one of the Members, there are, according to this report, over 16,000 people registered as unemployed and there are 700 vacancies.

If one talks to youngsters in our schools about how they see their future, their reply is one of despair because, sadly, they see no meaningful employment available to them in the area. That is not a recent development; it has been going on for many years.

Another issue of great importance to us in the inner cities is that the Government have no policy which will give any meaningful hope to men and women in the 50-year-old age group who may have worked for most of their lives but who suddenly find themselves unemployed, for whatever reason. I accept that that is a problem throughout the country. Such people expected to work until they were 60 or 65. I have asked many questions on this issue because week by week people within that age group come to see me and write me letters asking what advice I can give them. The problem is of crucial importance but the Government have no policy on that.

In the inner cities where, until a few years ago, we had flourishing industries we now see many sites being sold off to private developers. Comments have already been made about the docklands development. Those private developers are developing houses which certainly do not meet the needs of those living in the area. They are for people coming into the area with money.

The hon. Gentleman said that local authorities cannot be solely responsible for providing housing. I accept that we must have a broad housing base for people, be it private or local authority development. I am sure that this week all of us have received the annual report of the National Federation of Housing Associations. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman reads that. In it the federation is saying how difficult its task has become because of Government policy. Yet we all know that if we do not want just local authority housing it is to housing associations that we must look.

For many years I was associated with a housing association called Threshold, which operates in parts of London. It has a superb record, but it recently told me of the enormous problems that it has trying to help people with genuine housing needs. For a variety of reasons the local authorities will not be helping it and in no way will it be able to go down to the docklands and buy property that is being constructed there. I share with the hon. Gentleman the belief that I understood him to express that we must seek to achieve good housing policy for everyone.

Mr. Patrick Ground (Feltham and Heston): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the point that he is making about industrial land being taken up by housing development applies as much to municipal housing development as to private housing development and there is a great need in the inner cities to see that as far as possible land is retained for employment purposes?

Mr. Cox: I accept that. However, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman accepts that many of us who represent the inner city areas, where there have been the old, traditional, employments, often receive complaints from people about the environmental effects of such employment. Therefore, we must start to develop modern constructive employment opportunities within a housing development area. Sadly, that is something that we have not seen for many years. We are not seeing that under this Government in parts of London and, to be frank, we did not see as much as we should have seen under the previous Labour Government. However, I take the hon. Gentleman's point that that is something that we need to develop.

When the hon. Gentleman for Mid-Staffordshire talks about local authority housing it is true that there are some deplorable estates. We do not dispute that. But many of the problems on those estates can be traced back to Government finance restrictions. There is no doubt about that.

This is an ideal opportunity to get away from solely political points and quote organisations which, because of the nature of their involvement, hold views and expertise that some of us do not have to the same extent. I have here a report published by the Royal Institute of British Architects last summer along with a report called "Decaying Britain." It says:

> "Many authorities commented that inadequate housing investment programme allocations were placing a great and increasing strain on resources, reducing capitalised repair work and leading to reduced expenditure on environmental improvements."

There are problems throughout housing and the Government cannot contract out of their responsibilities.

The hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire has suggested that big business could be brought into the city areas and encouraged to develop. That sounds attractive, but, as my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) has said, not many of those on council waiting lists will live in the sort of development that will take place by big business. The hon. Gentleman's proposition will not lead to the broad balance that is crucial in the areas that my hon. Friends and I represent.

Mr. Heddle: The hon. Gentleman has missed the point slightly. I was trying to say that increased expenditure by government, whether central or local, has not produced the solution. Indeed, it has created the conditions that we are talking about. I am saying that it is time that we lifted our sights beyond bureaucracy and the public community chest to find the solution elsewhere. I have instanced Baltimore in the United States, where big business has produced the money to provide jobs and prosperity for the inner cities. If the United States can do it, Great Britain can do it. It is incumbent upon Opposition Members to make constructive suggestions as to how the partnership can be developed.

As for the prices of property in docklands——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. Interventions should be brief.

Mr. Heddle: With respect, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am answering the point that the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox)——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not use an intervention to make a second speech.

Mr. Cox: We do not see that the sort of partnership that the hon. Gentleman is suggesting will meet the needs of the constituents whom we try to represent in the areas from which we come, which are basically inner cities. The motion appears to be attractive, but if the nuts and bolts were brought together and the motion were implemented it would not bring a great deal of hope to the areas that we represent.

I shall restrict the remaining part of my speech to hospital services. Employment, housing, education and hospital services are crucial if we are to have the communities that we want in our inner city areas. It is interesting that this week we have heard concern expressed by a respected London Conservative Member about the Government's policy vis-a-vis financial allocations under RAWP to hospitals in London. If we are to restore confidence in our communities, the hospital and social services that are available to our constituents, irrespective of their professions and occupations, are crucial. However the figures are dressed up by Ministers, we are seeing a reduction in hospital and social services in our communities.

In Wandsworth we are engaged in yet another confrontation with the local health authority and the Government as we wish to keep open a major hospital. Sadly, St. James's hospital, Balham, is threatened with closure. The health authority is saying, "It does not matter because when the hospital is closed we shall have at St. George's hospital, Tooting, all the facilities that we want." That sounds attractive, but no one believes it. It is clear that the general public do not believe the health authority. That is demonstrated by the letters that they write and attendances at public meetings. I beg Ministers to start to listen to what people are saying about the rundown of hospital services that is taking place in Wandsworth and elsewhere. This issue has been taken up by the hon. Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler), and my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) has cited the hospital closures and the rundown of services in his area. It is something that the people of London will not continue to accept.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is aware that there are 12 teaching hospitals in London and 18 in the rest of England and Wales. I am sure that he is aware also that constituencies such as mine have been grossly underfunded for many years. We are spending about £3 million a year buying services from London which should be provided in my constituency.

Mr. Cox: I have the greatest sympathy with the hon. Gentleman's comments about a lack of services in his area and for the constituents he represents, but that is the responsibility of Government. If the hon. Gentleman and his constituents do not have the sort of services that they would like, we from the inner cities do not think that we should see a rundown of our services so that better services can be provided for Mid-Kent. I could run through the list of hospital closures that have taken place in many parts of London, but that would take too long and would be unfair on those who wish to participate in the debate. The fact is that RAWP, as it is applied to London, is entirely unfair.

The hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire talks about the broad balance that he wants to see in our communites. Unless we have proper funding from tihe Government and proper hospital services for our people, be they professionals, or skilled, or unskilled workers, we shall never get the broad-based communities developing that many of us would like to see. I beg Ministers to pay heed to this argument. The constituency of the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, the hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold), adjoins mine and many of her constituents must make use of the hospital services that are provided in the area which I represent, where hospitals are now under threat of closure. I cannot believe that she has not received letters of complaint. It is possible that she has not received as many letters as I have because St. James's hospital is in my constituency, but she cannot be unaware how crucial the issue has become to the people of London.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman will agree with me that a telling statistic—the hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) must be aware of it—is that in the past few years the sum spent on health services in Britain has placed us at the bottom of the league table of all western European countries, where previously Britain was one of the highest spenders. Unless the Government deal with this problem, needs in rural areas such as Mid-Kent and in urban areas such as those that the hon. Gentleman and I represent will not be met, and the services will become worse.

Mr. Cox: The hon. Gentleman has made an extremely valid point and I do not need to comment on it.

I welcome the debate and I am sure that many of my hon. Friends will wish to contribute to it. They may take a line similar to mine or they may take up entirely different issues. We welcome the opportunity to take part in the debate but we want to see some changes taking place. If anyone was saying exactly that, by golly, it was the electors who voted last week, right across the country—

Mr. Heddle: In Wandsworth?

Mr. Cox: Yes, even in Wandsworth—although we did not win the council, we certainly won council seats.

We are now hearing a great deal of talk that the Government are doing everything right, and it is only the presentation of their policies that is wrong. Those people are living in dreamland. No matter who presents the policies—be it the Prime Minister or the chairman of the Conservative party—until the Government change their policies on the sort of issues we are discussing today, there will be a continuing loss of support that will end in defeat for them at the next election.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I shall not follow the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) down his last road—although I have often had the pleasure of following him in debates. I say pleasure because, as the country knows, the Labour party has no policies. It is no good Labour simply attacking the Government if it cannot present alternative policies—other than £24 billion of higher spending, crushing everyone's income and imposing VAT rates of up to 41 per cent. on goods, thereby putting them out of the reach of pensioners and others. However, I shall not spend time on that particular point because the hon. Gentleman made many points with which I agreed—as he often does.

I spent 12 years teaching in Kings Cross, and one cannot be more inner city than that. I have watched the gradual elimination of open spaces and private housing to the stage where, in some areas, there is almost 100 per cent. public sector housing. For example, Tower Hamlets had several beautiful open spaces at the turn of the century, but under 50 or 60 years of Socialist councils—a reign that ended recently—those open spaces have been turned into concrete and housing. I am not suggesting that people should not have homes, but the planning has not been comprehensive. It has not taken account of the need for people to have room to breathe, room to move about, room for trees and grass to grow and room for children to play. There has been an obsession with building public sector housing and squeezing out almost all owner-occupied houses.

The result has been a rigid bureaucracy that has imprisoned people in their homes. I lived in east London, taught there and fought elections there, and I came to know the area well. Believe it or not, some people have been on the housing waiting list for 30, 40 or 50 years. Indeed, that state of affairs is not restricted to east London—it happens in urban and rural areas also. During my time in east London I found example after example of couples whose families had grown and left home retaining occupation of their three or four-bedroomed flats or houses. They wanted to move into smaller accommodation but found that virtually impossible because the bureaucracy did not operate sensibly. Sometimes people may be successful in moving from a house into a one-bedroom flat, but all too often they find that impossible.

I know of a current case of a couple with six young children under seven years of age who are stuck in one bedroom. They want to swap homes with a retired couple who want to move out of their larger property. Unfortunately, they are finding that swap impossible because in large public sector housing areas such a rigid bureaucracy has become established—and computers have not helped — that sensible exchanges cannot happen. That is a tragedy and something must be done about it.

The Rent Acts have provided protection for people already in the private sector, but others wanting to rent accommodation have no protection. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) made that point in his admirable speech. My experience in both inner London and urban areas is that, frequently, people in rent-controlled accommodation pay low rents even though they have good, well paid and well established jobs and money in the bank. Yet students and young married couples seeking temporary homes cannot find rented accommodation without paying very high rents. It is absurd and wrong for people with good jobs and money in the bank to pay controlled low rents when others with nothing have to pay high rents. There is something seriously wrong and we need to work hard to change the system and achieve equity for all.

During my 23 years as a teacher there was a gradual but strong move towards comprehensive schools. Indeed, I spent 20 years teaching in them and I enjoyed every minute. The profound and important argument put forward by those advocating the principle of comprehensive schooling was that it brought together children of all abilities and all social backgrounds, all of whom could be given equal opportunities. What could be better than that? However, there have been problems with the implementation of the comprehensive system — some comprehensives are excellent, but others are not.

The principles behind the concept of comprehensive education were attractive to me and, for ideological reasons, I was drawn into the system. As I have already said, I enjoyed every minute. The argument that most attracted me was that the system brought together people from various backgrounds — different family backgrounds, different income groups and different levels of intelligence—and the mix would contribute to the lives of everyone. Often, although not always, that has worked very well.

Why that same principle has not been applied by local authorities to housing, I shall never understand. Many local authorities, specially in urban areas, have been content to stick people from one background in one area, and only in council housing. They would not tolerate an infusion of private housing into vast council estates. It has only been the right to buy that has begun to reverse that. That is the great value of the right to buy—at last there are comprehensive housing estates. Progress is slow, but at least there are now some estates with people in private and council accommodation living cheek by jowl. That creates a better social mix, better care of an area and better attention to community life. That should be our aim.

The principle of comprehensive housing estates is essential to the future of all housing areas. I am sure that the Government will bear it constantly in mind. I hope that any alternative Government will see the sheer folly of putting only one type of person in one community. That is to the detriment of that community.

Concrete jungles, such as Tower Hamlets, have been a disservice to the people who live in them, for the reasons I have given, but also because they have not allowed mobility between homes and because they have squeezed industry out, resulting in scarcer jobs. One need only look at east London to see the effects of that principle, milking industries dry for rates and keeping rents low. This has damaged such areas. It is no good simply having homes where there are no jobs, and I ask my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State to bear that in mind.

Tenants in inner-urban areas face the problem of getting repairs done. A debate of this kind cannot ignore that factor. I can cite many examples of Labour authority areas and areas under authorities of other complexions where people cannot get repairs done in anything like the time required. Why are people required to ring the town hall to get a window repaired? Why can we not have an extension of the principle which Conservative Members have enunciated many times and let people either repair the window themselves or call in someone to do it and then put in the bill?

As for home decoration, which is so important to morale, why cannot people get their homes decorated to a reasonable standard or do the job themselves and then put in the bill? That would be much better than waiting for the council to do it. That principle is not operated sufficiently widely in urban areas. The hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) is shaking his head. I could take him to parts of the country where such a principle is urgently needed. Improvements such as I have described would end the nightmare for many.

Home improvements have abounded under the Government and it is greatly to their credit that more is now spent on that aspect than ever before. It is enormously worth while. Most home improvement schemes work well, but they are expensive. However, some do not work as well and tenants have to endure workmen around them pulling down walls and adding to buildings. Surely we could have a scheme in which such people were moved out for the duration of the improvement and were not moved back until the work was done. Of course, there is a danger that there will be less pressure to get the work done, but that would be better for people than being faced with workmen coming in and out of their homes. Often there is friction between the workmen's needs and those of householders.

As a prospective candidate for an east London seat, I saw a home improvement scheme undertaken by a Labour authority.

Mr. Tony Banks: Here we go.

Mr. Greenway: The hon. Gentleman is chiacking from a sedentary position. I must warn him that it will not get into Hansard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Mr. Speaker said that a qualification for inclusion of an intervention in Hansard may be that an hon. Member has referred to the intervention.

Mr. Greenway: Perhaps it will get into Hansard. I do not think it will damage the reputation of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), but it will not enrich it either.

I return to my example. The contractor used large amounts of the tenant's electricity, kept the gas fires on, and so on. He moved out after the improvements had been made and the tenant was expected to foot the bill. I remember battling with that Labour local authority for a refund of the electricity bill. It was a difficult job. Several tenants received a token payment but they had paid heavily for the gas and electricity consumed by contractors undertaking home improvements. Something must be done about such injustice.

[Mr. Greenway]

People living in urban areas face another difficult problem, and I hope that there will be improvements before long. I refer to the release back into the community of mentally handicapped and mentally ill people. This is not an easy matter in the countryside, but it is especially difficult in urban and built-up areas. I and other hon. Members know of many examples. People come into the community on that basis, but are inadequately prepared. I know of individuals who were put into a flat and were expected to cope after only a few hours' advice from a social worker on how to manage a flat. That was not enough. The people who join the community on that basis are often very disturbed and they create a great deal of local disturbance. I know of a man who often stands naked at his door—it is not that he is being funny or, in his view, provocative; that is how he is. The children run to look at him, and stare and laugh and run about. It disturbs the whole area. The same man has the television on loudly at all hours of the day and night. A person a few doors down frightens his neighbours by his appearance and by smashing the place around. The mother, her husband and small child who live opposite him are very frightened. They have asked me to ask the social services department whether the man is safe. I put that question to the director of social services and received a letter saying that the department could not say that he was safe. That does not inspire any confidence among the local community. This matter must be dealt with.

Recently, we considered a Bill which provided that people would not be released back into the community on that basis until proper statements had been made and they had been properly assessed and considered fit to return to the community. That legislation will make a great difference, and I welcome it.

Mr. Tony Banks: I think that all Labour Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), agree with the hon. Gentleman. There are plenty of cases of people who are allegedly returned to the community inadequately provided for and who, in their turn, provide massive problems for people in the community. What does the hon. Gentleman suggest as a remedy? Each one of us can give anecdotal accounts of such problems. What will the hon. Gentleman do, since these people are turned out because his Government have cut the Health Service and caused the closure of beds and wards in mental hospitals at weekends?

Mr. Greenway: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman is being fair to the Government. The return to the community of people who have been mentally ill has been widely supported in the House.

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Will the hon. Gentleman wait until the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) has finished rather than interrupt his speech?

Mr. Greenway: There is a problem in returning to the community people who are fit and equipped to cope. I think that that will happen in future. A Bill is currently passing through the House under which people will have to be assessed before they are returned to the community, and they will be returned only if that assessment shows that they are capable of sustaining a normal social life and of living happily with neighbours. That will help no end.

Mr. Meacher: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I rise to ask whether there will be a Government statement today on the huge cut that they are now proposing in mortgage interest payments for the unemployed for the first six months on the dole? It will affect 90,000 families and will undoubtedly cause evictions and homelessness for thousands of people. Is it not clear that when the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment rises to speak in this debate, which has covered housing and the right to buy, her colleague the Secretary of State for Social Services should come to the House to confess that he is destroying the right to buy for thousands of families who are unemployed? It makes a nonsense of today's debate.

I ask you to use your good offices, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to secure a debate or, at least, a statement from the Government on this issue. The announcement was sneaked out at the last moment in a written answer yesterday afternoon after a Green Paper, a six-months consultation period, a White Paper and a three-months Committee stage of the Social Security Bill. This is a last vicious kick at the unemployed which will undermine home ownership and cause untold hardship. I ask you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to use your good offices to secure an urgent debate by one means or another.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I know of no request for permission to make a statement on this matter. The hon. Gentleman knows very well that the question of a debate on this issue is not one for me. The Leader of the House is present, and I am sure that he has heard what has been said. We should return to the debate.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not wish to challenge what you have said in any way, but I am sure that you agree that my hon. Friend has raised an important matter. Will you advise the House by what means we may get a straight answer from the Government today? The terrible announcement last night has caused great anxiety to people all over the country, and it is just another example of the subterfuge used by the Government in the treatment of social security during the three-months Committee stage of the Bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This is not a matter for me and the hon. Gentleman knows as much.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): Further to the original point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am mystified and I truly need your guidance. I have heard so much lately about frank and open government and the way in which things are dealt with properly. It bemuses me that we apparently do not have a mechanism which can be applied by the Chair which can ensure that Committees are given the full facts, which would stop issues being brought out in this secretive and covert manner before the Report stage of a Bill. Is there no means by which, through you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, we can introduce a new form of mechanism to stop what I consider to be an abuse of the procedures of the House?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I always think of the wise words of Mr. Speaker Lenthall who, on one famous parliamentary occasion, said that he had neither tongue to speak nor ears to hear, except in so far as the House shall direct him. These are not matters for me but are for the House to decide. My job is to ensure the observance of the Standing Orders and rules of the House.

Mr. Tony Banks: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Surely this is a matter that should concern us this morning. I understand that hon. Members will be able to raise this matter during their contributions to the debate, but it is a matter of great concern to all of us—I would hope on both sides of the House—that an issue of such great significance will not be the subject of a ministerial statement. Surely it brings the House into disrepute when planted questions produce answers that have wide ramifications. Hon. Members will all be faced with problems tomorrow in our advice centres, and yet we are not in a position, in the great forum of debate, to have a proper discussion with the relevant Minister present.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We do not need to labour this too much. There is no point of order for me in all of this.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): On a new point, further to the original point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In your answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) you referred to the fact that the Leader of the House is in his place. So far, we have had no evidence that the Leader of the House has heard the points that have been made or that he has a tongue in his head. Can you assist the House by inviting the right hon. Gentleman to comment on the proposal put by my hon. Friend?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There would be no end to my making such invitations if I thought it proper to do so. I remind the House that we are discussing a very important matter in time allocated to private Members. The Leader of the House has obviously heard what has been said. Doubtless he will want to reflect upon it. We should return to the debate.

Mr. Meacher: Further to my original point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As you will know, probably better than any of us, when a point of order has been raised from the Front Bench and the Leader of the House is present, it is the normal convention that the Leader of the House volunteers a statement. I wonder whether he would wish to do so.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): I shall try to help the progress of the debate. Of course, I have taken account of what has been said and I shall reflect upon it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House will share my gratitude to the Leader of the House.

11.7 am

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): It was well worth delaying my contribution to the debate, simply to see the Leader of the House rise to his feet on this matter of great importance, even to today's debate. The fundamental problem faced by the inner cities is one of poverty. My hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) pointed out that about 90,000 people will lose by this squalid and mean measure. For Manchester, about which my remarks will be concerned, it means a further drain from the economy and from money going into the private sector about which the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) is so concerned. It will mean further pauperisation of those areas and further lack of opportunities. It will make it impossible to believe that regeneration of those areas will come about through the private sector mechanisms which Conservative Members seem to think will work. This issue is of signal importance. The House would be negligent if it did not demand a more adequate statement from the Government and if it does not get a definition and clarification of what lies behind the Government's actions.

In parts of Stretford, my own constituency, we now have 45 to 50 per cent. adult male unemployment. In the adjoining constituency, Manchester, Central, unemployment is at 60 per cent. in certain parts, and there is unemployment of over 70 per cent. of those under 24. Among the ethnic minorities, unemployment is now at such a level as almost inevitably to provoke the tensions which hon. Members on both sides of the House have been warning about for many years, yet the Government have done nothing about the problem.

There has been a massive leeching of income from the local economy. In effect, we have seen the destruction of the local economy. There have been estimates, not from Government sources, because the Government refuse to publish the information, that in the city of Manchester over half the population are living at or below supplementary benefit level. Imagine the amount of money which has disappeared from the Manchester economy, which has disappeared from the workshops in the very private sector which Conservative Members pretend to support. It is the Government's failure to give adequate income support in those areas which has destroyed the private sector as well as parts of the public sector in the centre of Manchester.

Since the Government came to power, over £1 million every week of every year has been taken away through rate support grant from the city of Manchester. At the same time housing benefit has been reduced, so that once again income disappears from the city centre. The cycle of poverty that existed when the Government came to power has not stood still, but a mechanism has been set up which has led to that cycle of poverty acting like a lance against any means of economic support. That is the reality and the scale of what the Government have done.

Conservative Members talk about the possibility of the recreation of the private sector and its ability to begin to revitalise that area, but they are talking about a totally different world from the one occupied by people on the housing estates in my constituency and, indeed, in most of our northern cities. The private sector simply does not exist in any recognisable form, nor does the private sector which does exist have the capacity to do what Conservative Members talk about. We do not have the regional capital markets in Britain such as those in Baltimore in the United States to which Conservative Members refer. Because of the failure of this country's capital system, we have a concentration of capital outside the inner city areas.

A substantial part of Trafford park industrial estate is in my constituency. It rightly claims to have been among the greatest industrial estates in the world. The irony is that the private sector and the local authority, which was Conservative until a week ago, have demanded assistance from the Government, yet the Government have been pussyfooting around with the assistance that they will provide. The private sector knows very well that there is no opportunity for it to continue to grow unless it can operate in an environment that will attract more companies into the area, so that it can build up an interlocking private and public system on the Trafford park estate.

That estate is in the borough of Trafford. Its importance lies in the fact that even my constituents, who live in the city of Manchester, have historically depended on the estate as the source of their employment, yet the Government have consistently refused to give partnership status to the Trafford park area. If such status were given, there would be a possibility of reinvestment from the public and private sectors together, to assist those who live in the partnership area—in Moss Side and Hulme—who have looked to Trafford park for their employment in the past.

I hope that today we shall hear that the Government have changed their mind on that policy, but I fear not, because the classic line that the Government have taken is that the boundaries are drawn along local authority lines and are not to be changed simply because of the way in which the regional and sub-regional economy works. I should be delighted to hear that I am wrong.

Far more fundamental than all the talk about the possibility of housing investment from the private sector in the centre of Manchester is a major problem besetting the city of Manchester, partly because of the historical process of the flight from the inner urban areas as they become old, and as mobile and relatively affluent people search for houses outside the centre. Today we have heard about the pressure on coming back to the centre of London because of the refusal to permit development along the M4 corridor and elsewhere. That is sound and logical for London and Greater London, but we do not have that problem in cities such as Manchester and most of the northern cities. It does not arise, because development land is still available on the outer rim and in parts of the former Greater Manchester council area. That flight from the inner cities is dictated not by relatively dear land there, but by the dereliction of the land.

I recognise that there has been an increase in the amount of money given under the derelict land grant. I applaud that for what it is worth. However, I remind the House that that increase is as nothing compared with the amount of money that has been withdrawn from the local authorities which have to operate those and other grants, making it unlikely that they will be able to provide adequately furnished sites even for private sector development in inner city areas. The private sector will simply move four or five miles down the road and find more suitable acceptable land for developers and purchasers. That issue must be tackled. More important is the fact that derelict land grant does not apply to areas which are categorised as obsolescent. Yet in the north-west, particularly Manchester, we have a tremendous amount of land that would be classified not as derelict but as obsolescent, so it would not be grant-aided if the local authority or the private sector wanted to develop.

Those are real and practical reasons why we shall not see the return of private house building to the inner city areas. Because of cuts in finance to local authorities, there has been a massive withdrawal of money from public sector housing. One of the direct results is that the city of Manchester has had to make some difficult choices. One hard choice that it has had to make, about which I have mixed feelings, is to reduce the amount of money available for improvement grants, which has had a significant effect on the private sector. The withdrawal of improvement grants has meant the slowing down virtually to zero of the revitalisation of parts of the city with many owner-occupiers and some private landlords. It is desperately important that the money goes back to authorities such as Manchester and into the improvement grant system.

I welcome the motion, but I feel that the Government fail to recognise the tensions in our inner-city areas. The crisis is already there and among us. Despair, misery and poverty are faced by constituents whom I and many Labour Members represent. The problem will not go away, and it is not getting better. As every day ticks by, their plight gets worse and there is more of the despair that produced the riots. I do not want to become a predictor of riots. I hope fervently that no such thing will happen again, but the Government have not done one thing to make such riots less likely. In fact, everything that they have done — their withdrawal of money and their contempt for people who live in those areas—has made it more likely that there will be another explosion in our inner cities.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Southampton, Itchen): I join in the congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) on winning the ballot and raising an interesting subject. I apologise to my hon. Friend the Minister, because I shall not be able to stay for her speech. Another Minister is visiting my constituency this afternoon and I hope that he will be able to give me a lift down there.

It was humbug for Opposition Members to interpose spurious points of order in our serious debate. The Audit Commission report on the management of council housing reveals that 11 Labour-controlled local housing authorities have a total of £100 million of rent arrears. The modest savings from the Government's proposal will total only £30 million. It is a bit rich for the Labour party to say that all hell will be let loose.

The protests of Opposition Members have more to do with a mischievous, scaremongering campaign to try to frighten council tenants from purchasing their houses.

Mr. Corbyn rose——

Mr. Raynsford rose——

Mr. Chope: Practically everyone knows that the majority of those who become unemployed are re-employed within six months, and it is most unlikely that any building society would take eviction proceedings against those who are temporarily unemployed and are unable to meet their mortgage commitments.

Mr. Corbyn rose——

Mr. John Fraser: Does not the hon. Gentleman realise that one of the crucial decisions is made before a purchase takes place? Some people on low incomes want to buy tumbledown houses and improve them, but are worried that they may become unemployed. We can always advise them, "Do not worry too much. You will be covered for your mortgage interest repayments in exactly the same way as tenants are covered for rent arrears when they become unemployed." The Government's announcement will undermine people who have to decide whether to buy and manage their own home.

Mr. Chope: That is not a complete answer, because the hon. Gentleman ignores the significant group who become unemployed but do not qualify for supplementary benefit. That is not a deterrent to them to buy their own homes.

Mr. Corbyn rose—

Mr. Chope: I will not give way again, because I ought to get on with the substance of what I have to say.

I am disappointed that the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) is not here, because I expected him to say what wonderful inner city policies had been pursued in Wandsworth and how they had received the endorsement of the electorate on Thursday last week.

The Borough News in Wandsworth today states:

"All the political pundits, except perhaps the staunchest Tory"

I suppose that we must add the name of the hon. Member for Tooting—

"were confounded last Thursday by the result of the local elections.

For the massive swing to the Labour side and the vast majority that most forecasters had predicted never materialised, and the Labour party was left with egg on its face and tears in the eyes of many of the defeated condidates.

The opposition parties will be picking over the bones of the election for many weeks to come to try to discover the reason why Wandsworth should have held for the Conservatives, when boroughs all around, like Richmond, Kingston and Sutton were going over to the Alliance and Labour".

Mr. Tony Banks: What about Lambeth?

Mr. Chope: The article refers to Lambeth. It concludes that people in Wandsworth voted on local issues and decided that the Conservative party in the borough had delivered the goods for them. In searching for solutions to inner city problems, the Government should not look much further than what has happened in Wandsworth and they should try to get what has been achieved there applied elsewhere in the country.

Above all else, people in the inner cities want commonsense policies, well-managed resources, good value for money and an attractive environment for residents and for enterprise. Those are the policies of the true friends of the inner cities.

Labour's policies for the inner cities are epitomised by a press story from Hackney. Judge Stuckley at Shoreditch county court said that an appalling case had come before him and that he wished that he was able to imprison the Hackney councillors who were responsible. The case concerned Mrs. Keaney, who has had five operations for cancer and waited more than a year for repairs to be carried out to her home in Hackney, notwithstanding the fact that she had obtained a court order. The Hackney council was in contempt of court for doing nothing about her problems. It permitted squatters to take over the property and wrote them a charming letter hoping that they would not be disturbed. The squatters responded by setting fire to the house.

Mrs. Keaney, who had been a council tenant for 15 years, lived in a property where the roof had fallen in, there was extensive damp, the walls were crumbling, and there were large holes in the floors where the boards had decayed. She had to move into cramped accommodation next door and her only remedy was to go to the courts. Yet the motto of Hackney council is, "Working for local people". Where does Mrs. Keaney fit into Labour's freedom and fairness campaign? There is plenty of freedom for squatters, but no fairness for tenants.

I have been asked about rent arrears. Is not it amazing that Hackney's rent arrears, as a percentage of the rent roll, have increased from 10·2 per cent. in 1983 to 27·2 per cent. last year? If the council had got in a little more of its rent, it might have been able to pay for Mrs. Keaney's repairs.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Chope: The front page of today's South London Press gives another vivid example of monumental waste. The Afro-Caribbean club in Railton road, Lambeth has been closed against, says the paper,

"a background of violence and confrontation with the police".

The club was opened three years ago on a £1·5 million inner city partnership grant as a community centre. In March, a man was shot in a feud between drug dealers. Later, a schoolboy was stabbed and, after muggers were arrested outside the club, two police officers were attacked. The chairman of the management committee said:

"Eighty per cent. of the people who go to the club do not come from Lambeth."

I have found out that the chairman, who has mismanaged the club in that way, is also chairman of Lambeth's community-police consultative group.

The mind boggles at the waste of resources and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will tell the House that the Government will apply some realism to the allocation of resources. If we carry on pouring money into places such as Lambeth, to enable vitriolic councillors and local people committed to the Socialist cause to misspend and abuse that money, we shall be doing everybody a disservice.

The most important need of the inner cities is not resources, but good management of resources. The way forward is the Wandsworth way. Wandsworth has spent £40 million in grants for private homes since 1981-82, and is spending another £12 million this year. It has spent £80 million on repairs and refurbishments to council homes in the same period. Since 1979 it has reduced substandard housing from 15 per cent. to 4 per cent., housing that needs repairs by over 13 per cent. and houses that need a bathroom from 12 per cent. to 2 per cent. Wandsworth has a capital spending programme for the current year of £65 million, the second highest in London.

Mr. Raynsford rose——

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Chope: Wandsworth has also attracted massive private investment. On top of all that, it has saved £25 million on council services by going out to competitive tender and often to private contractors.

Mr. Corbyn: What about the grass-cutting contract?

Mr. Chope: The grass-cutting contract has saved substantial sums for ratepayers in Wandsworth.

Mr. Corbyn: Is that the first contract or the second one?

Mr. Chope: Rather than engage in a debate with hon. Members who are interrupting from a sedentary position——

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Chope: I rest my case on the verdict of the electorate delivered on Thursday last week. About £100 million has been raised from the sale of council homes in Wandsworth and most of that money has been ploughed back into improving council estates. If that had not been done, wards with 60 per cent. of the electorate living in council houses would not have returned Conservative candidates. Wandsworth does not have cheap rents, but it does have good services.

Contrast that position with what happens in Lambeth, which has an equivalent population. In Wandsworth, the average rate bill is below £300, yet in Lambeth it is £543. The cost of refuse collection in Wandsworth is less than £9 per head while in Lambeth it is more than £17. The cost of caretaker services, which are far more efficient in Wandsworth, is just short of £9 per head, whereas it is £25 per head in Lambeth. Street cleaning services are much more efficient in Wandsworth but much less expensive. Rent arrears in Lambeth are £14·2 million, whereas in Wandsworth they are £3·1 million. There are squatters in 29 properties in Wandsworth, whereas more than 1,000 properties in Lambeth have squatters.

The most dramatic statistic is that the amount of money spent on repairs and renovation per dwelling in Lambeth is £118, yet in Wandsworth it is £786. That is why, in Lambeth, if a tenant wants repairs to his dwelling, he must go to the county court to get the council to act. Unemployment in Wandsworth, although it is sadly still far too high, is the lowest in inner London, whereas it is more than 20 per cent. in Lambeth.

The results of that superficial comparison between Lambeth and Wandsworth makes one amazed to think that an assistant chief executive in Lambeth who was earning £24,000 a year, presiding over the mismanagement that I have described, should have been appointed this week as the £37,000-a-year deputy education director of the Inner London education authority. He admitted that he had no education management experience and said that ILEA has a plethora of educationists and needs someone with a different angle on management. Inner London education needs an angle in management such as that produced in Lambeth as much as it needs a sore head. It is extremely sad that bigoted councillors can be elected who then behave in a thoroughly undemocratic manner by giving jobs to the boys and to people who are not worth the £37,000 a year that that gentleman will be paid.

The policies that have been pursued in Conservative-controlled councils such as Wandsworth are the way forward in the inner cities. The Government should not be so apologetic, as they sometimes are, about resources. Resources are being ploughed into the inner cities that are under Socialist control and they have been badly and gravely mismanaged. The Government should be much more robust in imposing penalties on those authorities which do not pursue reasonable and commonsense policies.

It should not be thought that what I am saying is to a great extent politically partisan. My views are supported by the Audit Commission, and I commend to all local authorities the report "Managing the Crisis in Council Housing". It is a well-researched and long report, so I shall not quote extensively from it. On page 4, it states that the scale of the value improvement potential in council house repairs is very large. It continues:

"If all authorities successfully apply the recommendations in this report, the benefits will be substantial: perhaps £80-100 million a year could be saved in excessive administration costs; the number of empty council properties could be reduced by 20-25,000; use of bed and breakfast accommodation could be more than 25 per cent. lower; rent arrears might be reduced by £100 million, or even more; and given better services, the funds available for maintenance could be increased by as much as £1 billion a year."

Our inner cities are crying out for maintenance of their fabric. That is not being delivered by the Labour party, and the Conservative Government should no longer aid and abet the Labour party in presiding over the decay in so many inner cities.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) for tabling this sensible motion. There is nothing in the motion with which my colleagues and I would disagree, although it leaves many things unsaid. Some of them are left unsaid because they are not appropriate to the specific points that the hon. Gentleman was trying to make, and others are left unsaid because they might cause disagreement.

The subject at the core of the motion is partnership in housing provision and the partnership principle in other provision. May I say, a little tongue in cheek, that I do not need my research assistant to advise me on these matters because, since leaving college, I have spent all my adult life in my constituency. I know at first hand and well appreciate the issues, and my experience is added to by regular daily contact with constituents who are the victims of inner city deprivation. I appreciate the daily concerns of tens of thousands of people in London and other inner cities.

I need not be as strident as the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope). I am encouraged by the thought that, as a result of last week's elections, the Liberal party can speak with more authority by virtue of its increased representation on inner city authorities. In the five northern former metropolitan counties, the alliance has more councillors than the Conservative party. That is a substantial change. Only one metropolitan district remains under Tory control, and that is Solihull in the west midlands. In the elections in London last week, the number of alliance candidates elected to local boroughs in the 12 inner London authorities doubled from the number elected four years ago. Only a few London boroughs—I am afraid to say that Newham is one—do not have Liberal or Social Democratic councillors.

Mr. Tony Banks: May I correct the hon. Gentleman's faulty geography? Although Newham has all the problems of the inner city, it is outside the Inner London education authority area.

Mr. Hughes: That is right. I was simply reminded by seeing the hon. Gentleman in the Chamber that Newham is one of the few authorities in Britain to be a single-party state after the elections. I cannot say how long that will continue.

The elections also showed that grave distortions are caused by our electoral system, which do not help the partnership principle. I shall not make a speech about electoral reform. However, a good article written in The Times by the hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) about the results of the ILEA elections shows the gross disproportion of seats to votes cast.

The Minister will be aware that the massive majority for the Labour party in the ILEA election, with a small role for the Conservative party and the alliance, is a grossly disproportionate reflection of the views of the electors. Such results will encourage the fainthearts in the Conservative party before long that the arguments for reform in the electoral system for local government are overwhelming. In Wandsworth, the Tories remain in control, but the Labour party obtained more votes. In many other boroughs such as Lambeth, Lewisham and Greenwich, the Labour party has a large majority of seats but did not obtain a majority of votes. There is an urgent case for reassessing the need to ensure that the entire electorate is fairly represented in our town halls.

The Minister will know that London is still unable to have parish or community councils. The rest of urban Britain can, and there are some areas such as Birmingham which are parishing at the moment. Much of the alienation that is to be found in the inner city in London arises because there is no very local structure of representation. Will the Minister discuss that with her colleagues, especially if we are to have more local government legislation next year in the light of the Widdicombe inquiry?

Mr. Rowe: I strongly support parish and community councils, but the hon. Gentleman's support for them seems to contradict what he said about the need to take more account of the aggregation of votes across a local authority area rather than the number of votes cast locally for a candidate.

Mr. Hughes: There is no contradiction. It is quite possible to have a fair electoral system for local government and also to have a more local system of representation. My experience is that the people of London would appreciate being involved locally in decisions as much as possible.

Housing is one of the themes of the motion. Partnership is manifestly welcome and works. The hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) and I have watched with some frustration what looked like a hold-up in the partnership scheme for Coin street in Lambeth and Southwark. The housing development has now been approved by the Department of the Environment. The community resisted speculative development, to produce homes for local people, mainly on a co-operative basis, on a site which had been depressed because of speculative office development.

The scheme is now going ahead, but there was resistance to it right to the end from, I gather, the Conservative party in Lambeth and perhaps, by virtue of a knock-on effect, the Government. Such a partnership scheme is to be applauded. It combines public and private money and the interests, expertise and commitment of local people. We won a similar battle in my constituency recently at the Cherry garden site. What would originally have been all private development will now have some local authority development, planned with the involvement of local people. I hope that we can also obtain the same community participation on the Brunel road/Swan road site in Rotherhithe.

Partnership is vital, not least because the alternatives have failed. We have had the blind municipalism of the inner city, increasingly dogmatic Labour-controlled authorities. People do not want to be condemned to municipal ghettos. We have also had unbridled commercialism such as we now have in the docklands. This is no good either, because it prices land and homes out of the range of the people who want to live there and have a right to live there because it is their community.

It is no use telling housing associations that there is derelict land in north Barnet when those associations want to cater for the elderly in Southwark, Lewisham, Lambeth, Hackney, Greenwich or Newham. The partnerships must be where the people live.

We must consider the matter locally and nationally. We must have an honest, open and wide-ranging debate about housing finance. I appreciate what the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire suggested. We must consider how building societies and other similar institutions contribute funds. I believe that the money should come only from institutions with a housing interest and which will recycle the money into housing. The profits of finance houses might well not go into housing and we would run the risk of unacceptable commercial gain. We should also consider the equity of tax subsidies given to private and public occupiers. There is a proper debate to be had about the differential between the subsidies that the Government give to people who buy their property and those who rent it. The equation has been changed with inflation. We must correct the unfairness.

The Government might produce a Green Paper or a White Paper about financing housebuilding in the inner cities which embraces all of the possibilities. Last night's announcement, which was the subject of a point of order today, gives rise to great anxiety. It is unacceptable to withdraw support from people who, through no fault of their own, have become unemployed and have been encouraged to buy their own home, perhaps stretching themselves financially to do so.

Mr. Steen: Has not the hon. Gentleman got it the wrong way round? My understanding is that the Government will meet mortgage interest payments during a person's unemployment but that the sum involved is taken out of the sum that the person realises on sale. The Government are not cutting anything. They are merely saying that a profit should not be made out of public money that is pumped into a private home.

Mr. Hughes: I do not believe that that was the announcement. It was to do with the first six months of unemployment. The withdrawal of support is a great threat to people who have just started to buy who or who can only just afford to buy. The latter condition applies to an increasing number of people.

There is desperate need for partnership in regard to jobs. Local authorities should be encouraged to have enterprise forums where public authorities and private entrepreneurs can discuss how to pool their money to generate trade and work. We should have a network which joins people with skills, those who are willing to learn them, people with facilities and people with the service skills to back them all up. We must find a remedy for the gaps in provision.

Inner London desperately needs some form of development agency. During the past 20 or 30 years, inner London has suffered more job losses than any other major conurbation. The docklands regeneration deals with only a fraction of the problem. The time has come to recognise that inner London needs some form of development agency to put it on a par with the deprived regions of Europe, which draw money from the European regional and social funds, and to reconsider how the urban programme works.

We have a muddled urban programme. In the seven south and east London boroughs, sometimes called the crescent of deprivation — it runs from Islington to Lambeth — three have one form of status under the urban programme, one has another and three have yet another. There is, however, the same massive deprivation in parts of all of those boroughs. Unemployment in my constituency and that of the hon. Member for Norwood has increased by more than 10 per cent. in the past year. We need a quickly adjustable mechanism of support.

We have had a small initiative in which there are eight target areas, including one in Peckham, but that is not enough because one needs to include it in a large package that needs to be substantially reformed. The urban programme has been developed piecemeal, and now we need a comprehensive review of it so that it achieves what it is intended to achieve, which is to meet the greatest urban needs.

The hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) spoke about health care in inner London. It is in a desperate state. Inner London boroughs have some of the highest numbers of socially deprived people who most need health care of any part of Britain. They have the highest number of pensioners. Our levels of perinatal and infant mortality are consistently higher than in outer London, and our infant mortality rates are higher than those in south Yorkshire or Merseyside. Inner London suffers more deaths from cirrhosis than any other conurbation. Deaths from accidents, violence and poisoning are increasing in inner London, although they are decreasing nationally. Male suicides are increasing faster in inner London than elsewhere, and we have the highest levels of mortality from many preventable diseases.

Obviously, we have a higher proportion of old and vulnerable people in our population than elsewhere. In my area the unemployed account for 28 per cent. of the male population. We need to reconsider the funding of the Health Service in London. I know that that is not the Minister's specific responsibility but she may appreciate our anxiety. The health districts in inner London are always in a minority in their health region and compete against the outer London health districts. That means that there is a transfer of funds under the resource allocation working party formula from the so-called prosperous south-east to the rest of the country, and, within each of the four Thames regional health authorities, from inner London to outer London. The formula was designed at a time of growth in the national economy, but it is being imposed at a time of little growth. As a result, it is causing gross and severe hardship.

When one of my constituents had a heart attack recently, he had to be driven privately to hospital because there were no ambulances to take him. People wait in hospital corridors, and are turned away when they arrive for their beds. Although the Government are encouraging facilities to help drug abusers, young alcohol addicts and young, vulnerable, psychiatrically disturbed people, those units are to be cut in the Maudsley hospital, which the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security visited yesterday.

Mr. Corbyn: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that one way to proceed would be to create an elected London health authority? That would avoid the ridiculous competition between the home counties, the suburban areas and the inner urban areas. Secondly, does he agree that the figure for the funding of primary health care for people in London is misleading because the overall costs include the costs of the teaching hospitals, which are essentially a national resource, the costs of which are often set against the cost of health care in London?

Mr. Hughes: I entirely accept both those points. Hon. Members of all parties in inner London now agree that the RAWP formula should not be applied at present, and that money must be found elsewhere for constituencies, such as that of the hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe). I am not saying that such shire areas should not receive funding, but because we are now spending disproportionately little on our Health Service compared with other countries and our needs, we must change the formula and fund national and regional specialties separately. We in the alliance have long believed that the only medium and long-term solutions are to create one London regional health authority so that we do not have this crazy competition between the deprived inner city and outer areas, which naturally want more funds.

Waiting lists continue to grow. Every time a patient is not treated, his chances of working and contributing to the community are reduced. That creates a cycle of decreased participation and yet again reduces possibilities for the regeneration of inner cities.

Yesterday it was reported in the London Standard that next Wednesday the Home Secretary is likely to make an announcement about policing personnel levels in London. The problems will not go away even if the number of police is massively increased. The Commissioner asked for an establishment of 30,000, and I believe that that is needed. An increase of 1,200 in over three years will not be sufficient. Before next Wednesday, will the Minister relay this point to her colleagues while not encouraging the police to become complacent—because there is a danger of that—and believe that more personnel will solve all the problems? Their crime detection rate is below 20 per cent., and the statistics for their service delivery in London are not wonderful. London and Londoners need greater protection. They are vulnerable, and are regularly the subjects of increasingly horrifying attacks. Unless more police can work on the streets with our communities, we shall continue to be deprived. People will be afraid to live in the inner cities, and will move to safer places elsewhere.

The debate has given us an opportunity to discuss a range of our cities' problems. They are all urgent because unless our cities survive and prosper, the nation will fail.

11.56 am

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): I am glad to have an opportunity to speak in the debate. First, I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) for the way in which he introduced the debate. His speech was one of the most far-reaching and all-embracing that I have heard on inner cities. We are all grateful to him for approaching the subject in that way.

I am glad to follow the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), who has also added to the debate. It is a difficult subject, and all hon. Members are trying to find new solutions and ways of tackling the problem. It is appropriate that we should have as many contributions as possible to the debate, so I shall not detain the House with one of my customarily long speeches. The House does not debate the inner cities often enough. During the past few months we have discussed some aspects of them — for example, in the Housing and Planning Bill — but it is a rare treat to have a full debate, and we are deeply grateful to my hon. Friend for it.

The motion highlights housing and related matters. Inadequate housing is at the root of the inner-city problems, but there is nothing new about bad housing. The slums of the 1930s have given rise to the slums of the 1980s. The back-to-backs are replaced by vast soulless impersonalised blocks, towers and estates. In the 1930s the back-to-backs were in private ownership, but today the soulless estates are in public ownership.

In any debate, it is necessary to define one's terms. The House takes for granted the phrase "inner city", but it has assumed a new meaning, and it is important to identify what we are talking about. The phrase no longer means a geographical business district in part of the city. We use the expression to describe the worst of poverty—people locked into the worst conditions, with the highest percentage of deprivation factors such as low income, unemployment, old age, bad housing, membership of an ethnic minority and few prospects.

"Inner city" equals a concentration of high indices of disadvantage. Those ingredients can be found in the centres of great old cities. There are pockets of inner-city deprivation in Birmingham, Bristol, Liverpool, Manchester, Bradford, Glasgow and Newcastle. However, it also exists outside inner cities, on outer city estates where the inner city populations have moved lock, stock and barrel. As we know, the comprehensive redevelopment programmes of the 1950s and 1960s moved a high concentration of inner-city dwellers to council estates outside the cities.

"Inner city" equals ingredients of disadvantage compared with the rest of the population. It means people without professions, jobs, credit facilities and bank accounts — people who are the products of unemployment, poverty, and single-parent families. An over-concentration of such people in certain geographical areas and streets describes the phrase "inner city", and it may or may not be in the geographical location of the heart of our great conurbation. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire will agree that the phrase inner city must include those vast, soulless public estates on the outskirts of inner cities. They are as bad as, if not worse than, some of the traditional inner city localities.

Successive Governments have tried to do something. It would be wrong to suggest that the problems of the inner city are the monopoly of any one party. One can trace the beginning of awareness of the problems of the inner cities to the Labour Government in 1968. The then Prime Minister shifted rate support grants from the shire counties to the inner cities. In 1968, £60 million was transferred from the shire counties to the inner cities and the Conservative party created an uproar. Now, 18 years later, the Labour Benches are creating an uproar because the same thing has been done by a Conservative Government.

Mr. Corbyn: Was not the shift in rate support grant in 1968 occasioned by the fact that the Government of the day recognised that there was a basic problem of inner city deprivation? Our reasons for demanding the restoration of the rate support grant today is the same — inner city development can be dealt with by public sector investment through local authorities. It is for that reason that we are demanding the restoration of the money.

Mr. Steen: I did not quite follow the hon. Gentleman's argument. I note what he said, but I shall not be drawn. More and more public money has been pumped into inner cities, and there seems to be a correlation between the increasing sums of money pumped in and the worsening situation. The hon. Gentleman will probably disagree, but I shall advance my argument.

Mr. Corbyn: If the hon. Gentleman accepts that the Government have reduced the rate support grant to inner city areas, by and large he must accept that those authorities which have managed to maintain services have done so largely by increasing rate support by borrowing. Investment in inner cities has been self-financed by the people in the poorest areas. Our argument is that national resources have to be put into the poorest areas, rather than inner cities being expected to pay for their own poverty.

Mr. Steen: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's clarification of that telling point, with which I have to deal, and I hope that I can deal with it successfully.

In 1968 there was both the shift in the rate support grant and the dreaming up of the urban aid programme. It was only a small operation then, but has now been enlarged to £320 million. There was the community development project, and the young volunteer force, which I had the great privilege of directing. There was also the concept of pockets of deprivation — an idea with which hon. Members may be familiar. The theory was that there was nothing wrong with the inner cities except for small pockets of deprivation which could be cleaned up by money direct from the centre or the shire counties.

By 1970, with the change of Administration, the idea was that some research was needed, and a number of schemes were set up. There was the neighbourhood scheme and the quality of life studies, and larger amounts of money were concentrated into the areas. Hon. Members will remember that the idea was that the pockets of deprivation could be cleared out of the inner cities by pumping more public money through these schemes. However, the problem did not go away.

In 1973 the then Secretary of State for the Environment in the Conservative Administration said that the approach was wrong and that there should be a total approach, looking at the city as a whole. He started more research. He had the six towns study, the urban guidelines studies and the inner area studies. In 1974, so enthusiastic were the Conservative Administration that an urban deprivation unit was formed, which I believe is still hard at work in the Home Office.

Later in 1974 the Labour Government appointed a Minister with special responsibilities for the urban areas. He disappeared without trace six months later and in 1976 the Minister of State, Home Office said that everything was wrong. He did not believe in either the pockets of deprivation or in the total approach, but in a comprehensive community programme — that was the weasel word. The problem would be solved if local authorities drew up a new list of priorities with central Government. That was the beginning of the partnership between local and central Government. The comprehensive community programme had a trial run in Gateshead, but never got any further. That programme disappeared without trace in 1977.

In 1977 the Secretary of State for the Environment in the Labour Government introduced a White Paper on policy for the inner cities and all the familiar jargon was there. In 1978 there was the Inner Urban Areas Act, by which local authorities were to assist industry by means of loans and grants. Also in 1978 came the partnership programme, which we now take for granted. The Secretary of State set up the partnership authorities. The beauty of that is that it is not a partnership. It is just a matter of public sector people getting together and disagreeing. It is a lovely system whereby the Minister comes up by train or by chauffeur-driven car, attends the meeting and goes off again. It is not really a partnership in the sense of the word.

If one cannot be a partnership authority, the second option is to be a programme authority. I am not sure what the programme is, but I suspect that it is much like the partnership, in that people attend meetings and argue. There is a third division for the designated districts, which are down-market. They get, not a Minister of State, but a junior Minister. I mean no disrespect to my hon. Friend the Minister, but designated districts are definitely down-market and do not get the top brass. Again, the scheme concerns only public authorities.

Since the White Paper and the Inner Urban Areas Act there has been an enlarged urban aid programme. That is not a medical term, but a device which the Government have used to pump more public money into the partnership programme and designated districts. In 1979 the Minister of State, Department of the Environment said—and I quote from my book on this subject, "New Life for Old Cities" — it is a well-researched document and hon. Members may find it of interest—on page 17:

"The Government is not prepared to abandon the inner cities or the people who live there to a steadily declining future. In Britain we have a political commitment which the present Government"—— that is the Conservative Government—

"has renewed and reasserted in what we believe will be a more efficient form to regenerate the inner areas of our cities. The aim is to arrest and reverse the downward spiral rather than simply to alleviate the various symptoms of decline in isolation. Our goal is to make the inner areas of our cities places where people want to live and work, somewhere where the private investor will put his money."

That was published in 1979.

If one looks at what was said by the Home Secretary in 1968, under a Labour Administration, one sees that he said virtually the same thing:

"The aim of the urban aid programme is to provide for the care of our citizens who live in the poorest and most overcrowded parts of our cities and towns. It is intended to arrest this as far as possible by financial means and to reverse the downward spiral which afflicts so many of these areas as a deadly quagmire of need and poverty."

The true situation is best mirrored by what was said by the Secretary of State for Energy in 1981. This was under a Conservative Administration:

"Britain's worn out industrial areas will be passed by in the coming economic recovery, bringing heavy social consequences, bewilderment and frustration."

Until 1980 it was believed that all the different devices and sums of money that were poured into the inner cities in different ways would solve the social problems. When the Conservative Administration came to power in 1979 they had to find a new way to approach these problems, because the other approaches had failed. They looked at America and saw that President Carter had taken the public money injection concept to its logical conclusion in what was called the model city programme. They do not take half measures in the United States. They took one small neighbourhood area of Atlanta and said that they would pour into it whatever amount of public money was needed to change completely the face of the neighbourhood. They provided $173 million over three years. Everybody was moved out of that neighbourhood. The houses were completely rebuilt. New drains and new lighting were provided. Everything was done to change that neighbourhood completely.

What was the position 10 years later? They looked at the social indices for that area and found that about the same number of young people were unemployed, or were on probation, or were suffering from drink and drug-related problems. They also found the same problems resulting from old age and from physical and mental illness. The Americans have proved the point better than have any Government in this country that the inner city problems will not be solved by pumping large sums of public money into one area. The people living in that area will not be changed. The problems which those people manifest will not be changed.

When the Government came to office in 1979 they adopted a new approach. I do not say that it has been overwhelmingly successful, but it is a different approach. Instead of pumping any amount of public money into tackling social problems, the Government said that they would try to create a new kind of partnership. In his excellent speech my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire very properly outlined the partnership between the public and the private sectors. The Government's urban strategy, through the urban development corporations, the enterprise zones, the freeports and the Merseyside task force, is designed to attract private money by injecting small amounts of public money. The derelict land grants, the urban development grants, the inner city enterprises, the garden festivals and the enlarged urban aid programmes are designed to try inject private funds into these schemes, in partnership with public funds.

Despite the injection of public and private money, the inner city problems continue to get worse. That must be a matter of concern to every right hon. and hon. Member. Some Opposition Members say that more public money needs to be spent on inner cities, and some of my right hon. and hon. Friends say that there should be a partnership between the private and public sectors. I do not believe that the problems that people face will be solved by offering false hopes and false prospectuses. New life in the inner cities will be created only by adopting a different approach, because the problems of the inner cities relate to people. No Government have introduced that dimension. It is far easier to work with the macroeconomics — with the banks and the building societies, to boost the urban aid programme and to set up urban aid programmes — than it is to work with and involve the very people who are the problem and help them to help themselves to solve their problems.

I shall be accused of adopting a simplistic approach, but all the other approaches have failed. The man from Westminster descending from a chauffeur-driven limousine for a partnership meeting and then disappearing is no substitute for giving power to people in the inner cities. They must be given access to money and the power to make decisions about the matters that affect their destiny. Central Government and local government have failed. Let us give the people a chance.

What is required? First, we must shift control over homes from the public sector to the people who live in the inner cities. That means that a mechanism must be found whereby a high percentage of those who live in the inner cities are able to live in properly run houses. We must find a way in which rents can be converted immediately into mortgage repayments so that they own the fabric of the houses in which they live. Nothing would be more dramatic than to change the housing stock in the inner areas.

We must also change the attitude of the public sector, whether it be central Government or local government. They must trust the people and involve them in finding solutions to these problems. We must also give people access to cheap funds so that they are able to start up in business and in housing. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire mentioned Baltimore. In Baltimore they trusted the people. The banks provided cheap money for people to do up their homes and to start up businesses in that inner city area. We must find "catalytic" cash, if I may call it that, for some of the deprived people who do not have security on which to borrow funds. We must lift the planning restrictions. We shall not change the face of the inner cities unless the planning regime is lifted. Some of our inner cities could hardly look worse if there were no planners. Liverpool is a good example.

Why do we not allow anything to be built in the inner cities which is not noisy, which does not smell, and which does not block light? Why do we not try this in one area which is in decline and allow a free market force economy to operate? We must encourage private enterprise and business by launching industrial revenue bonds. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire was right to refer to these. This country needs industrial revenue bonds and municipal revenue bonds. I shall not tire the House by explaining how they work, but I would set up neighbourhood councils and transfer authority to the people living in those neighbourhoods to care for those neighbourhoods. Home helps should come from the neighbourhoods. Electricians and plumbers should come from the area in which the work needs to be done. We must get the mums to run their own play schemes. Local government should trust the people by financing them to help themselves.

Finally, we must do something about public derelict land. I have had this bee in my bonnet for 10 years, and it is worth mentioning it yet again. Every year the amount of public derelict land on the land register increases. Whatever the Government do, the amount of land on the land register goes up. In another book which I hope to bring out shortly I shall show that over one third of a million acres of public land are lying dormant, derelict and under-utilised. For that reason, the pressure on the green fields continues.

Those of us living around the large urban conurbations will find constant pressure to build by house builders and others. That is understandable, because they have no land to build on in the inner city, even though I believe that one third of a million acres in public ownership are under-utilised.

Plymouth is a good example. My constituency nearly surrounds it. The pressure to build on my green field sites and agricultural land is great because Plymouth city council and all the other public undertakings inside them, including the Ministry of Defence and other Departments, are not releasing public land which should be used first for housing before the green field sites.

There are things to be done. The Labour party is wrong to go down the same alleyway as it went down in 1968 of throwing money at the problems in order to make them go away. They have not gone away. The Government have done the right thing in obtaining a partnership between the private and public sectors. The one dimension that is still being left out is the people, and that is the next approach in solving the problem.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) promised us a short speech. At 25 minutes it was the longest speech since that of the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) who opened the debate.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I shall attempt to be briefer, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I must apologise to the Minister for the fact that I fear that I shall probably miss her contribution because I have a long-standing engagement to attend.

I have raised the issue of housing in my constituency in inner London many times in the House and I make no apology for doing so again because it matters deeply to thousands of my constituents. Far too many are forced to live in inadequate, damp, mould-encrusted, overcrowded and unsuitable homes. The conditions in which many of my constituents have to live out their lives, bring up children, entertain visitors and try to make a decent life and a decent home for themselves are totally inadequate and unsuitable.

Many young couples in my constituency are desperately anxious to get married, to start a family and to start making a life for themselves. Yet they are unable to do so because they cannot set up an independent home because the accommodation, quite simply and frankly, is not available.

Some 7,000 families are on the waiting list for council accommodation. Some 8,500 families are on the transfer list, wishing to move out of one kind of unsuitable accommodation into better accommodation. There are 1,000 families reporting every year to the local authority in my area as homeless under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977. That is the scale and condition of the problem.

In those circumstances, I fear that to speak nobly, as the motion does, and as the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) did in moving it, of a right to rent and a right to buy for my constituents is a fanciful chimera. It is nonsense to speak about a right to buy when it costs £50,000 to buy a tiny one-bedroom flat in most of my constituency. To buy any sort of house in my constituency costs at least £100,000. House prices have risen by 19 per cent. in the last 12 months. In those circumstances, to talk about a genuine right to buy for ordinary Islington people is, frankly, nonsense.

[Mr. Chris Smith]

Further, to speak about a genuine right to buy when the Government have consistently refused to give the same privileges to tenants of private sector landlords that they have been keen to give to tenants of public sector landlords, to abjure the possibilities of equity between the private rented sector and the public rented sector, as the Government have consistently done over the past eight years, is not to be even-handed in wanting to give genuine rights to buy to people, whatever their condition or tenure. The Government came up with a wonderful scheme about two and a half years ago for tenants of charitable housing associations. They were going to give lots of money to them to move out of their present rented flats to assist them with the purchase of properties in the private sector. The scheme has virtually run out of money so that that chance is now being denied to many tenants of charitable housing associations. What is more, the great majority of tenants of charitable housing associations in my constituency are tenants of the Samuel Lewis trust, the Sutton trust, the Guinness trust or the Peabody trust and the properties which they occupy were constructed before housing association grant was invented. Therefore, they as tenants are excluded from the provisions of the Housing and Building Control Act 1983 which gives the opportunity to move out to people supposedly in charitable housing accommodation. Therefore, they are denied the right to buy.

When Conservative Members speak about a genuine right to buy for ordinary people in inner city areas they should think rather more carefully about what they are saying because, frankly, the right to buy does not exist in any realistic sense whatever.

The right to rent is the only recourse to the overwhelming majority of people in inner city areas such as Islington. How on earth can we talk about a genuine right to rent when the Government have reduced housing investment programme allocations for areas such as Islington by two thirds in real terms over the past seven years and when they are restricting the amount that local authorities can spend on providing decent rented accommodation through the operation of severe and savage restrictions on the capital receipts which can be used by local authorities to construct new accommodation and to improve existing accommodation?

How on earth can we talk about the genuine right to rent when the estate action programme carried out by the borough of Islington to improve the inter-war estates to make them good and decent places in which to live is being cut back because of Department of the Environment restrictions on the quality of accommodation which can be produced under that programme?

How on earth can a Conservative Member come to the House and talk about the right to rent when those restrictions are being imposed savagely on the opportunities that are available to thousands of my constituents who wish to rent a good, clean, decent, nice place from their local authority and are being denied that opportunity because of the enormous cuts that have been made?

Yes, of course, Mr. Deputy Speaker, we must welcome any moves to link the private and the public sector. I should dearly love to see the hundreds of empty properties above the shops owned by the private sector in my constituency brought into good housing use. It is often ideal accommodation for young, single people or some young couples. That could happen if the Government were prepared to take a more suitable line on the use, for example, of partnership funds by local authorities to assist in the renovation of these properties and their subsequent letting to those on enormously long waiting lists. Assistance could be given by a rather more flexible attitude on the part of the district valuer in not derating such properties, which means that there is no incentive for the owners to bring them into genuine use. Many measures could be taken to try to link the private and public sectors in that way, but the Government, I fear, are doing little to encourage that to happen.

There must be partnership between the private and public sectors, but we must not use that partnership between the private and public worlds as a substitute for good, proper and decent fully funded public provision, which is the major form in which regeneration can come to inner city areas, with good housing being provided for those who live within them. I fear that the Government have a tendency to use rhetoric about the private sector as a substitute for real action by the public sector, which has been cut so much over recent years.

I shall refer briefly to two other aspects of inner city life which have not yet been spoken about and were not included in the speech of the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire. The first factor is the sheer scale of poverty among so many in inner city areas. There are so many in my constituency who are entirely dependent on the Department of Health and Social Security for their livelihood, for the money that they receive each week for any shreds of dignity which they are left within their lives. The conditions in which they have to supplicate for that funding from the DHSS are nothing short of appalling.

I have raised before in the House the problems that afflict my constituents when, for example, they go to the Tavistock square office of the DHSS. They have to wait in queues before the doors open. When admitted, they have to wait for hours and sometimes days at a time in grossly overcrowded and inadequate conditions. It is ironic that Dickensian scenes are painted on the walls, so that people can reflect on how little things have changed over the past 100 years. These are the conditions that people have to endure. They are not Dickensian supplicants; they are citizens who are there to secure their rights. The way in which the DHSS treats them, through lack of space, lack of proper facilities and lack of proper funding for its offices that serve the inner city areas, is nothing short of disgraceful. I await, with keen anticipation, the opportunity to read Hansard on Monday. I hope that I shall read assurances from the Minister that she will, yet again, bring these problems and issues to the attention of her right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services.

Another issue that has not yet been touched upon is the impact of traffic on inner city areas, especially in inner London. The volume of traffic is increasing. There is an increasing number of vehicles and the lorries or juggernauts that pile into areas such as my constituency are increasing in size. They travel along Holloway road, down Upper street, along the Liverpool road, down New North road and along City road.

I fear that the Government have started to make things worse. With the demise of the GLC, they are introducing into the House measures to provide for the trunking of considerable quantities of road in my constituency. These measures, quite rightly, are alarming many residents who fear that, with no local recourse to protest, the Government in Whitehall could make decisions, because of the trunking of roads—for example, the trunking of Upper street, which runs through the heart of my constituency—to widen roads, which would encourge more traffic to come into the area, which no one in my area wishes to bear.

Of course, there must be essential deliveries and vehicles must have rights of passage, but everything conceivably possible must be done to steer the large lorries and vehicles away from densely packed inner city areas —and widening and trunking roads is not the way to do it. I hope that the Minister will draw the attention of the Secretary of State for Transport to some of the problems and issues that matter so dramatically and deeply to many people living in areas such as Islington.

In all the areas that we have discussed—housing, poverty and the environment in the inner cities—we have from the Government only the rhetoric of care and interest and very little action. My constituents deserve a far better deal from the Government. I long for the day next year when, under a Labour Government, they will get it.

Mr. Patrick Ground (Feltham and Heston): I join hon. Members in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) on his choice of subject and on the way in which he dealt with interventions in his speech.

As someone who lives in an inner city area that is high up the Department of the Environment scale of urban deprivation, I cannot accept what my hon. Friend said about a revival of human life being necessary in the inner cities. Nor do I accept some of his observations suggesting that it is the ambition of all people to live in the suburbs. There are many people who like living in inner cities, who prefer them to other areas and who want to stay where they are.

I accept the definition of my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) that inner-city areas, for the purposes of the motion, should include many outer-city areas that suffer from the same problems. I am pleased to see the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) nodding, because many areas in London that are not strictly inner city nevertheless suffer the problems that we are discussing.

The perspective of the debate about housing is that generally housing conditions in the inner cities and elsewhere have improved under Governments and councils of all political colours. Housing statistics clearly show that there are more bathrooms, more inside lavatories and much less overcrowding than in the years immediately after the war, and that improvement has continued. However, it might be that that general improvement makes even more unacceptable the bad housing that remains, especially where some of the worst of it has been built during the past 25 years.

As a matter of policy, there is nothing new in the motion; much of it is contained in the 1977 White Paper "Policy for the Inner Cities", which recognised the need for private investment in the inner cities. I am bound to say, as someone living in an inner city area, that at the time the White Paper was very welcome because it made a number of points that had not been obvious in Government policy previously, especially the need for human scale in new developments. The document emphasised, perhaps more than previous Government utterances, the importance of making a more attractive physical environment in inner city areas so that, in general, they would become or remain places where people would live as a matter of choice.

The White Paper stressed also the relationship between inner city problems and the problems of the regions in which the cities were situated. In my maiden speech I called for a review of the regional strategy for the south-east to take account of the changes in population forecasts and the fact that some of the growth areas were taking people away from London in a way that had not been intended. I very much welcome the changes in regional strategic guidance for the south-east made in February this year by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. He plainly contemplates that a larger proportion of development than in the past will go to London and the other urban areas and proportionately less will go elsewhere.

A number of matters should be of priority for the Government in tackling the next phase of the problems of the inner cities. The first is the condition of public housing stock and repairs to council properties. In my constituency I write probably more letters on this subject than on any other. The right of repair, which has recently been introduced, is a welcome innovation. It is nerve-racking for tenants faced with substantial repairs to decide how to use that weapon. Indeed, it may not be an appropriate weapon when serious problems are involved.

It is interesting and important to recognise that councils such as Wandsworth have succeeded with a high level of spending in improving their council estates while not being at all extravagant—in fact, the reverse—in the amounts levied through the rates. The figures are striking. More than £800 on average was spent on each property owned by the Wandsworth borough council whereas the figures in other areas were lower. In some cases, less than £100 —in some areas a derisory amount—was spent.

In the context of public sector housing, the Government should be concerned with the people who live in Bison housing and those who have bought their house from a local authority. Those who remained in the properties as tenants are having expensive strengthening work done, but many of those who bought their home from local authorities are without any form of expert advice of the type given to local authorities and are left in the dark about what they should do. It would be salutary if my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State were to press local authorities to give tenants the best technical information available so that they could arrive at a sensible decision, and to reveal the expertise that has been made available to them.

Enormous progress has been made by the Department of the Environment in public consultation and ascertaining people's views as to the sort of development they want in their areas and the sort of housing that should be provided. Many of the lessons of the past have been learned, but in the provision of open space for leisure and purposes of that sort the level and quality of public consultation is still extremely rudimentary. Many of the provisions being made for leisure are grotesquely unpopular — for example, the expensive provision of a plastic football pitch in a residential area with houses all around. A maximum amount of nuisance and annoyance will be caused to residents who will see an area of green disappear for something visually much less attractive, and they will be faced with the prospect of floodlighting and noise on many evenings of the week.

On matters such as that and the provision of open space there should be a good deal of improvement in consultation and communication between central Government, local authorities and residents. In that way the Government and local authorities would recognise the importance that people attach to better standards of open space provision. In many areas, far from an improvement, there is an erosion of public open space, even in areas where the shortage has been recognised for many years by the Government. I was interested to hear the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) about the provision of open space in London. I certainly hope that the Government will give priority to reversing the indifference which has apparently been shown by the Government and local government on this subject. For example, where substantial erosion of public open space in an inner city area would be caused by a development proposal I would hope that the Minister would not hesitate to call that proposal in. Too often, the Minister refuses to call it in and leaves an inspector to make the decision, as though it is not a matter of environmental importance.

The hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) referred to the provision of private housing in areas which had previously been used for industry and commerce. He agreed with me that the same point arises where commercial and industrial land is taken and used for building public housing. Too often in inner London Governments, of both colours, have been overjoyed at the prospect of any form of development on sites which have been derelict and without a use for some time and have not been sufficiently tenacious in insisting upon an adequate provision of land for industry.

One of the problems in the provision of land for industry throughout the country is that progressively more and more land is required to provide employment. The use of space is very much more generous in terms of the number of employees than in the past. If satisfactory sites for employment are to be provided in inner cities, it requires a strong policy on the part of the planning authorities, insisting that land allocated for industry is, as far as possible, used for that purpose. Where that policy has been followed, in most cases of which I am aware, employment opportunities have arisen, and the land has been satisfactorily developed.

Those are some of the matters that I suggest are of priority. I should like the Department of the Environment also to consider the points systems that are used by local authorities, and to consider whether systems that give priority to people according to the scale of squalor in which they live are necessarily good policies for housing in the inner cities. Too often, there is no incentive for applicants on the council housing list to do what is possible to improve their housing condition. They stand to lose points, to lose their chance of earlier accommodation. That area should be looked at, as well as the extent to which residents who have lived in the area for a long time and their local connections should be considered in the allocation of council housing. I believe that the present system, for good and worthy reasons, places a premium on squalor, which is perhaps not in the best interests of the sensible housing of people in inner cities. It gives less opportunity for people to improve their condition while they are waiting to be housed.

I support what was said by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) about tenants of housing trusts, who have neither the right to buy nor the right to be paid money to be housed elsewhere. A large estate in my consitituency, the Beaver estate, is in that position. Many of the tenants would like to buy, and many would like to move elsewhere and buy property, but, because of the historical quirks of the way in which their estate has been developed, they get neither right. The position of such tenants should be considered by the Government because is seems anomalous that they should not be given at least some of the opportunities that have been given to other tenants.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Fulham): The motion is curious, because while much of the phrasing is couched in terms which many hon. Members on both sides of the House would find it easy to support, if one looks at the implications of the phrasing it becomes clear that if what it suggests was followed through it would involve a major reversal of the Government's policies.

The most curious thing of all is this. As I listened to the speech of the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle), it became clear that he has no intention of instituting the logical policies that flow from the terms of his motion. Instead, he is advocating a strange mismatch of curious and mainly irrelevant measures, which will not have the effect which we in the Labour party seek. We want a serious programme to tackle the undoubted needs of the inner cities.

I should like to explore some of the concepts mentioned in the motion. There is much play with the idea of partnership. Surely partnership involves sharing and a mutual contribution to achieve a more effective response to needs, yet it is abundantly clear that the Conservative philosophy of partnership, in the context of the inner cities and housing, is different. It is a concept of substitution, of substituting private for public initiative. That is what privatisation is all about. It is not about ensuring the most effective contribution of both public and private sectors to achieve the building of more homes, as the figures will show. All that we have seen under this Government is a series of drastic cuts in investment in public sector house building and measures to transfer ownership from the public sector to the private sector. We have not seen a concerted programme to achieve a large output of homes.

The figures are startling. Ten years ago the public sector was starting about 170,000 new homes each year and the private sector was starting about 150,000. Last year, as a result of repeated and serious cuts by the Government, the public sector had been reduced to only 33,000 new starts. That reduction removes options and choices from people who may need public sector rented housing.

There has been hardly any increase in private sector output. About 160,000 new private homes were started last year. That was an increase of 10,000 on the figure of 10 years ago, but in that period there has been a drastic reduction in public sector building and the overall result is a reduction of 100,000 in the number of new homes being built each year. There are fewer homes to meet people's needs.

The picture is much more serious in the worst inner city areas. There were about 25,000 new starts in the public sector in London 10 years ago. Last year the number was just 2,500—one tenth of the previous level. The private sector had achieved an increase, but only from about 5,000 new starts to about 8,000. In London last year there were about 11,000 new starts, compared with 30,000 in 1975.

The Government's policies have resulted in a dramatic reduction in the number of new homes, partly because of substitution and partly because of cuts in public sector provision. The result is not an effective partnership to achieve more, but a reduction in the public sector's ability to contribute.

The motion refers to "the right to buy and the right to rent".

Most Opposition Members strongly agree with that concept, but the Government clearly do not agree with it, because they have limited the right to buy to council tenants. They do not advocate a right to buy for private tenants, yet many of those tenants live in the worst areas of exploitation.

Thousands of private tenants in my constituency would dearly love to buy their homes from bad landlords who do not maintain them, often charge extortionate rents and are often guilty of the most disgraceful neglect of the welfare and interests of their tenants, but those tenants are not afforded the right to buy and are afforded no protection. Their interests are ignored. The Government have a one-sided policy. They are interested solely in substituting private property for public housing.

The right to rent is a cruel illusion under the Government's policies. One million or more households on council waiting lists have no prospect of obtaining a rented home because of the shortage of available lets. Homelessness has reached record levels. Nearly 100,000 households were accepted as the responsibility of local authorities last year, because they could not find anywhere to live. Many of them had to be put into dreadful bed-and-breakfast accommodation, in poor conditions and at vast cost to the public purse.

Mr. Rowe: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, for comprehensible reasons, successive Governments have loaded private landlords with many restrictions and that that is a major factor in the non-availability of rented accommodation?

Mr. Raynsford: I ask the hon. Gentleman to be patient, because I intend to tackle that subject later.

Council houses are not the only properties in the public sector. Housing associations have been able to make an important contribution in recent years to meet the needs of the poorer sections of inner city populations who need rented housing. Yet this important contribution from housing associations has been the victim of cuts in Government expenditure. As a result of the reduction in funding available to local authorities to support housing associations, and because of restrictions on the budget available to the Housing Corporation, there has been a dramatic reduction — especially in London — in the contribution that housing associations have made through rehabilitating older homes. In 1976-77 about 12,300 homes were rehabilitated by housing associations in London. In 1984-85, the last year for which figures are available, that number had fallen to 5,700. I am certain that the 1985-86 figures will be lower, but the final figures are not yet available.

There has been a dramatic reduction in the number of homes available to rent. That makes nonsense of the rhetoric from the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire about providing the right to rent. The right to rent requires choice, and it requires options and homes being available to rent. It is clear that those homes are not available in sufficient numbers through the local authority sector and housing associations.

I do not wish to say too much about the private rented sector, except to stress that its decline has been a continuing feature of housing policy for the past 80 years. It has continued irrespective of whether landlords have had more or less freedom to evict their tenants. The Rent Act 1957 reduced the security that some tenants enjoyed. It was followed by an increase in the number of evictions and became associated with the era of Rachmanism. The private rented sector declined even faster than it had previously. There is no evidence to support the thesis that providing options for landlords to rent without restrictions on security will increase the private rented sector. That was an illusion which the Conservative party included in its rhetoric before 1979, and which some people may have believed to be possible.

Mr. Rowe rose——

Mr. Raynsford: I have already given way to the hon. Gentleman. I have little time left.

Mr. Ground: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will give way to me.

Mr. Raynsford: Yes.

Mr. Ground: If the hon. Gentleman is dealing solely with the increase in the private sector, which might or might not be caused by those factors, why does he not also consider the possibility that the decline in the rented sector might be slower if there were more incentives to the private landlord to rent?

Mr. Raynsford: I am grateful for that contribution, because the evidence reveals the strength of my case. The Conservative Government elected in 1979 moved rapidly, in the Housing Act 1980, to introduce shorthold tenancies, assuring us that this would lead to an increase in the number of lettings. However, the figures for London for the year after the introduction of the Act are illuminating. That year, about 16,000 lettings were withdrawn from the market. That was consistent with the decline in the private rented market in previous years. Only 300 shortholds were created, which is a measure of how ineffective and irrelevant the concept of shorthold tenancies was to the provision of rented housing.

There is an economic mismatch between the amount of money that a landlord can reasonably expect to receive from his investment in private property and the amount that ordinary people seeking rented housing can afford to pay. That economic mismatch is at the heart of the decline of the private rented market, and no amount of shuffling round with security of tenure will change that. The private rented market, in its old form, is doomed and will continue to decline. Parliament's responsibility should be to ensure that the decline is offset by the provision of housing for rent to meet the needs of those who cannot afford to buy. The only agencies capable of providing it properly are local authorities and housing associations, and they should be encouraged.

[Mr. Raynsford]

The Labour party is in favour of the right to rent, and it was responsible for an amendment to the Housing and Planning Bill which would have gone some way along the route advocated by the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire in providing the right-to-rent accommodation left needlessly empty by local authorities. It is curious that he should have advocated that, when the Government opposed the amendment which we tabled less than a month ago. That is a measure of the inconsistency that is creeping into the Conservative party. If we are to achieve the right to rent, it must be on the basis of an adequate supply of lettings and an adequate choice. That is manifestly absent now. We need more investment and the provision of homes by local authorities and housing associations to meet the need.

The third issue that I want to mention is one of the most tragic that afflicts us—the rise in homelessness. It has continued from the late 1950s. It has not been caused, as the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire suggested, by the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977, which commanded the support of reasonable hon. Members on both sides of the House and which sought to alleviate some of the disastrous consequences of the continuing rise in homelessness. Sadly, the rise has continued.

To discover the causes of the rise, we do not need to go much further than an excellent study carried out by Professor John Greve in 1970, which considered homelessness in London. He identified three major causes of homelessness: first, eviction by private landlords; secondly, domestic friction involving marriage breakdown or people having to leave parental homes because they could no longer stay there; and, thirdly, the shortage of accommodation, which prevented people from finding homes of their own.

Those three reasons are still fundamentally the causes of homelessness today, but a fourth has come increasingly into prominence. It is the breakdown of mortgage arrangements when people no longer have the means to pay their mortgage. The problem has been highlighted by the huge surge in the number of mortgage accounts in serious arrears in the past few years, rising to unprecedented levels. Figures show that one in 10 of all people who are accepted as homeless in England are homeless because they have been unable to keep their mortgage payments going.

It is against that background that last night's announcement by the Minister for Social Security is so profoundly depressing and deplorable. In view of the rising risk of homelessness because people are unable to meet their mortgages, what is surely needed is a policy that will help them to cope, not one that will punish them by reducing their entitlement to supplementary benefit to help meet their needs.

It is a curious comment that, once again—we have seen it all too often in the past seven years—housing policy is being affected by snap decisions being taken by other Departments, in this case the Department of Health and Social Security, purely to achieve a saving. There is no logical policy basis for cutting supplementary benefit help for people in difficulty with their mortgage payments. It is necessary to give that help, but it is being cut because the DHSS is trying to trim its budget, just as housing benefit has been cut for the same reason. Rent arrears are being exacerbated by DHSS decisions, and now homelessness will be, just as happened as a result of that cruel attack on board-and-lodging payments to young single people last year and again this year. The DHSS has promoted and caused homelessness.

That is a sad comment on the state of housing policy and the increase in homelessness. Perhaps saddest of all is the evidence of lack of movement by the Government to deal with it. I should like to focus on the implications of a recent House of Lords judgment involving a family called Pulhofter. The judgment included the bizarre suggestion by one of the Lords that the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 was not about housing the homeless. It would require a fairly lengthy exploration of the archives of Byzantium to find a more curious concept. The result of that judgment is that the rights available to homeless people have been seriously eroded. Many more are likely to be refused accommodation by local authorities and, as a result, will be left on the streets, swelling the army of people who are homeless and disaffected.

What is urgently needed, as is stressed in early-day motion 855, which is supported by hon. Members on both sides of the House, is action by the Government to deal with the problem of that judgment, to amend the Act to secure the rights of homeless people and to avoid abuse of the loophole which the Lords created which means that some local authorities do not need to implement the 1977 Act.

Instead of a positive response, we have no action at all. I have heard recently that an approach by voluntary organisations seeking a meeting with the Minister has been rejected. That is evidence of an unwillingness to tackle one of the crying needs of our time.

Although the motion raises a number of interesting concepts, it serves only to highlight the inconsistency and hollowness of Government policy. If the needs of the inner cities are to be properly met, we need an active investment programme which will provide the homes that are at present needed, make a reality of the right to rent, which is otherwise purely hollow rhetoric, and provide options for people who will otherwise become homeless.

1.9 pm

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): It may seem strange for an hon. Member from a constituency such as mine to participate in this debate, but I have had an interest in this subject since I was concerned with the community development projects run by the Home Office many years ago. I should also like to correct the impression that mine is essentially a rural seat. It is an urban seat with a small rural part. Chatham is one of the Medway towns which are some of the most densely populated areas of Kent.

The debate has been interesting and has demonstrated a polarisation of attitude. That is entirely understandable. If I were faced daily with the number of people in misery as so many Opposition Members who have spoken are, and with the victims of the worst forms of abuse by landlords and other denizens of the inner cities, I would naturally believe that the solution was simply a massive injection of resources. I would think "Here is the need. Why do we not simply meet it by pumping in resources?"

Resources are indispensable, but so is excellence in their deployment. I shall give an example from an area in which I have been working recently. I do not believe that there is a director of social services in the country who could not make a case that would convince nearly all of us that his or her department should have more social workers and ancillary staff. The inspectorate has said that in the vast majority of social work departments there is little or no supervision of the basic grade field worker. In other words, there would be no guarantee that more resources pumped into social services departments would achieve any of the objectives sought by the director.

We are living in a substantially pauperised society with some 14 million people dependent in whole or in part for their incomes on means-tested benefits. One third of those who go out to work do so to bring home a net gain of £25 a week or less over what they could get if they were on benefit. That is a horrific figure. Moreover, that balance would not require a great deal of tilting for a large number of those estimable people, who choose to work rather than to stay at home and do nearly as well for nothing, to stay at home. If that happened, the problems facing society, whether in the inner cities or outside them, would become almost unmanageable.

All hon. Members must ask themselves whether the injection of resources, which must be paid for by those in work and those providing employment, would do anything to help the problem. This is one of the reasons that has impelled the Government to put their proposal about mortgage repayments to the Social Services Advisory Committee. I hasten to say that this is a proposal that has not yet been agreed. I am one of those who will be suggesting to my right hon. Friends that a better way to deal with the problem of an equity gain from a mortgage on which the public sector is meeting the repayment would not be to cut mortgage repayments at the beginning but rather to lay some claim to the appreciation in the value of the property pro rata for the contribution that the public sector has made to it later on, and not when people are at their most despairing.

Successive Governments have pumped money into the inner city and have contributed to its pauperisation. The hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Raynsford) will know better than I that great essay on housing by Professor Donnison, in which he pointed out that since the war every Government have achieved exactly the opposite effect in their housing legislation to that which they set out to achieve. This is not an easy matter to resolve. One of the consequences of the way in which we have proceeded in recent years is that we have destroyed a balanced community.

Some years ago, I went to talk to the Labour leader of one of the inner London boroughs. He told me that he was desperate to achieve a mix of housing in his borough but because a number of young idealists had taken possession of his council and believed passionately that the people who had the right to the first and best houses to be built were the poorest members of the borough, he was unable to build houses that he could either have let or sold to people on above average incomes. Both sides of that debate are respectable sides to hold, but the consequence of one-class housing over large stretches of the inner city is that everybody ends up impoverished.

The hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) referred to the Church's report "Faith in the City", a report that I greatly welcomed. However, one of the least attractive sentences was that which expressed, with some surprise, that the members of the committee had found a large number of intelligent people in the inner cities. There is a terrible danger of enormously under-rating the people who live, often against great odds, within the inner city. I cannot agree more with my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen), who urged upon local authorities and others that we should give much more power and control to the people who live there.

One of the effects of pumping public money into the inner city has been to establish hugely expensive bureaucracies run by people who pull the salaries that ensure that they no longer continue to live in the areas for which they express so much public concern. A great proportion of that money might be better spent by people in the area. We need to encourage personal responsibility within the people who live in inner cities. Often enough, they are only too glad to take it if they are given some assistance and some assurance that, if they do so, they will get the rewards.

I can give an example. The gentleman who had most to do with rehabilitating the Watts suburb after the riots in Los Angeles came over here, and one day saw a young lad playing pool in a youth centre at 11 o'clock in the morning. "What are you doing?" he asked, to which the lad replied, not unreasonably, "I am playing pool." "It is 11 o'clock in the morning. Why are you playing pool, which is a leisure pursuit?", asked the man. The young lad said, "Because I have nothing else to do." The man asked him, "Is this your youth centre?" "Yes", said the young lad. So he was asked, "How can you say that you have nothing whatever to do when the windows of this youth centre are filthy and when the floor is covered with rubbish?" We feel that our function is discharged if we provide facilities, but thereby we deprive those who use them of a sense of responsibility. If the facilities belonged to them, they would play a much larger part in their management and maintenance.

Having referred to some of the problems, may I suggest a few possible remedies. The Government should offer a guarantee of employment to those who have been unemployed for more than three years. It would have to be worthwhile employment that provided more money than people can get when they are on the dole. I am unable to define it more closely than that, although I have a few ideas about it which I share with some of my colleagues on the Select Committee on Employment. That would change the nature of our inner city problems. One of the inner city problems, thanks to the beneficence of previous Governments who have thrown money into the attempt to lure companies away from the inner cities and put them on green field sites, together with their skilled workers, is that now we have a population in the inner cities which is substantially without skills. There is, therefore, a tremendous need for training.

Local authorities should sell off, by means of a mortgage equity arrangement, some of their community facilities to groups of people who live in the area, who could manage those facilities and thereby share in the equity. As they made profits, they could take a larger share of the mortgage equity. The Treasury succeeded in destroying a most important incentive. Local authorities were encouraged to sell council houses but the Treasury refused to allow them to spend that money. The Treasury failed, but the Department of Health and Social Security did not fail. It allowed the district health authorities to spend the money that they saved from closing hospitals and selling off unwanted land. The inner cities should be allowed to do the same.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) that we should encourage people to set up co-operatives and tender for the right to carry out some of the functions that are now performed by local authorities. Co-operatives to provide home helps and similar functions would be very useful.

The worst feature of polarisation to which I referred at the beginning of my speech is the unwillingness of so many inner city local authorities to consult their business communities. The Government have made it obligatory for local authorities to consult the business community before they set a rate. However, I hear tales from all over the country of the extraordinary unwillingness of local authorities to set up a reasonable consultation procedure. If local authorities will not consult their business communities they will remain alienated, the rates will increase to an unreasonable level and more and more of those employers will leave.

I end on a well-reported anecdote. Some years ago, the mayor of one of the towns in New York State discovered that businesses were pulling out of his town to such an extent that it was bumping up the unemployment rate. He asked one or two of the companies why they were leaving. They told him that they were very happy where they were but that they had looked ahead and foresaw that in four, five or 10 years' time they would be unable to survive as easily there as they would be if they moved to, say, San Francisco. He then called together all the businesses in his patch and asked them what sort of facilities they saw themselves requiring in three, four or five years' time. As a consequence of being able to do some joint planning of that kind, he not only managed to retain businesses but to secure new ones.

If we are to talk about partnership in the inner cities, we must get away from the suggestion that the private employer is somehow there to grind the faces of the poor. Rather he is there creating the only sources of revenue which can sustain the inner cities. We must make sure that the consultations that take place between private business, local authorities, Government and everyone else concerned with the inner city are constructive, creative and forward-looking, not defensive and polarised.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) and I have sat through most of this interesting and important debate. Unfortunately, we have only five minutes left to share between us.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) on having introduced the debate, because it gives us the opportunity to discuss a matter of national concern. It has highlighted just how badly divided Britain is today; how dangerously divided our nation has become.

The divisions that we often talk about between the north and the south are apparent. We talk about the relative prosperity of the south as opposed to the high unemployment-blighted areas of the north. It is a division that is not precise, but it is one that we recognise.

There are also the divisions within the inner cities. The great divisions in London are there and are available for all to see. Such extremes of poverty and wealth within London are dramatic and they represent a source of potential conflict within our capital city which we ignore at our peril.

This has essentially been a debate about housing. It should have been an economic debate from the beginning. The problems of the inner city arise essentially out of Britain's economic malaise. They are, at base, economic problems. We see in massive unemployment, high real interest rates, a record number of bankruptcies, a record balance of payments deficit on manufactured goods and the steady destruction of much of Britain's manufacturing base, the problems of the inner city. It is in the inner cities that the consequences of the economic folly of monetarism is seen in all its horrid forms.

I shall be holding my advice surgery tomorrow morning in the London borough of Newham, the second most deprived local authority area in Britain, according to the Department of the Environment's statistics. As the hon. and learned Member for Feltham and Heston (Mr. Ground) said, out of the first 20 most deprived local authority areas in the country, 10 are in London, and three of those are in east London. That is real poverty. That is real deprivation. It is about no jobs and no hope. It is about living in a society whose youth are surrounded by all the trappings of a consumer society. Our young people are bombarded with consumer goods which they can get if they have the wherewithal to achieve them, but of course they have not, because they have neither the jobs nor the prospects of the jobs. It is little wonder that many of them reach out and grab those goodies. That is why in the inner cities we have seen such dramatic increases in street crimes, drug pushing, prostitution and all the other problems. They arise out of the economic malaise which Britain in now experiencing.

Conservative Members talk about the destruction of the community, but this Government have done more than any other Government since the war to destroy the values of the community. They are a Government based on institutionalised greed and selfishness and the devil take the hindmost. That is the Government's economic and social philosophy. They talk about not being able to solve problems by throwing money at them. I tell the Minister that problems cannot be solved by taking money away, and London has lost about £4 billion in rate support grant since the Government were first elected in 1979. That is where the problems of the inner cities start. They start with the rotten economic values of this Government. Until we get rid of the Government, we shall never get rid of the problems of the inner city.

1.30 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): It is ironic that I seem to have rather less than a couple of minutes in which to speak about the inner city area which I represent, which has suffered enormous deprivation and high levels of unemployment for many decades.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) was correct when he said that the problems are economic ones. The inner city area which I represent has an elected local authority which is hamstrung by the Government. The local authority can attempt to alleviate the serious housing and social service problems of the people of Islington, but it has virtually no control over the industrial life of the borough, and it has no control over the borough's economy. It can provide and develop services, but it cannot develop the economy within the area, because it has no control over it. A process of deregulation, cut and closure and the giving of unfettered life to capitalism in inner-city areas makes the problems of inner-city deprivation worse instead of solving them.

If anyone wishes to see the ultimate in setting capitalism free in London, let him go to the Wapping print plant, which has been constructed in a rate-free and tax-free haven by a foreign multinational entrepreneur. The purpose is to destroy the jobs of print workers and the public are forced to pay for the police force to suppress those who are trying to get their jobs back in that plant. If Conservative Members believe in free speech, why do they try to muzzle every local authority which speaks up about deprivation in its area?

Another aspect of inner city deprivation is the Health Service, and a curious phenomenon is the growth of commercial private medicine. I have an excellent book, which was produced by the Greater London council before it was tragically abolished, entitled, "Commercial Medicine in London". It tells of the so-called freedom of choice for the people of London. Apparently they can choose to queue at their hospital for a hip replacement operation, or any other fairly routine operation, and wait two years before it is carried out, or pay to go into a private hospital in Harley street. The choice is a non-existent one. My constituents do not have that freedom of choice and they have to queue.

It seems that the message is getting through to the Government that the people of London are fed up with the way in which their Health Service has been treated. That is why the Minister for Health wrote his curious and weasel-worded letter of 7 April to the chairman of the London group of Tory MPs claiming that there had been an increase in Health Service expenditure in London and listed a number of new hospitals that had been constructed. He wrote:

"The suggestion that the changes now taking place will mean a general decline in services for Londoners is not justified by the facts. The Health Service is making increasingly efficient use of the funds available because of the improvements in treatment techniques and the increased use of day surgery."

I do not know when the Minister last went to a London hospital or examined the curious way in which the efficiency of the Health Service is examined, which means that the through-put of patients is the sole arbiter of whether a hospital is efficient. If the patient visits a hospital several times because he has been released too soon after an operation, that is often ignored. Early release is regarded as an increase in efficiency, when it is the very opposite.

A series of figures have been produced by an excellent organisation called London Health Emergency, which was established with GLC support. It states:

"Barney Hayhoe speaks only of particular examples of new projects, claiming increases in spending. He leaves out the fact that overall health spending in London's 30 health districts has been cut by over £70 million since 1982 with a loss of 1,876 beds in 1984 alone and with well over 5,000 jobs cut."

The document lists the new buildings in various district health authorities. It is certainly true that new hospitals are being built, and, for example, the development of Islington's Whittington hospital is very welcome. We want a decent, good hospital on that site. What we do not want, however, is the closure of Friern Barnet or neighbouring hospitals, which would take away that advantage, or the cut of 69 beds and the loss of 278 jobs that has occurred since 1983.

The issue of health care in London appears to be haunting the Tories. It certainly haunted them in the local election campaign, and it will continue to haunt them. Is the Minister satisfied that the RAWP formula does anything but bleed the inner-urban areas of London dry of Health Service resources? Does she not now accept the need for a democratic London health authority? Does she not also accept that there is something quite evil about a proposal to close a hospital such as St. Thomas's for one month in August, or the Middlesex, which was closed last Christmas, simply to make up the shortfall in expenditure?

Each time regional health authorities try to bail out a health authority to stop it closing a hospital temporarily, that means that another health authority cannot be bailed out. What we need is a London health authority, with a massive injection of capital, so that we can provide the Health Service that is needed. Above all, we need an end to the parasite and the cancer that is private medicine in London, private pay beds in NHS hospitals and privatisation of NHS resources to line the pockets of a bunch of scroungers who are trying to live off the NHS and bleed it dry.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): I congratulate the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) on his luck in the ballot and on initiating what has been a thoughtful, if hard-hitting, debate.

I wish to define what I see as the inner-city problem. The problem in Tyneside is different from that in Liverpool, as it is from that in Lambeth or in Islington. There are distinguishing features as between one inner-city area and another, and we do well to recognise that.

Having said that, the inner-city problem is a concentration in urban areas of a number of problems—what the hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) called a density of deprivation. Central to those problems is poverty, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) pointed out and as the Archbishop of Canterbury's report underlined.

That poverty is coupled with wholly unacceptable levels of unemployment—typically about 25 per cent. male unemployment. I use the figure for male unemployment because it is often a truer reflection than the level of female unemployment. There are even higher levels in limited areas. It is by no means unusual to be told in inner-city constituencies that unemployment has reached 70 or 80 per cent. in small, limited areas. Neither is it unusual to be told that unemployment among school leavers is as high as 50 per cent.—even 70 per cent. among certain ethnic groups. In my borough there are 3,000 unemployed school and college leavers who have never known the experience of work.

The problem is characterised by inadequate housing, long waiting lists, unacceptable levels of homelessness and, of course, the contradiction in many areas of an acute shortage of housing at the same time as we have the phenomenon of a large number of local authority dwellings that are classified as being hard to let.

The problem is also distinguished by an unstable population, family breakdown, poor health, low levels of appropriate skills and, increasingly, an educational under-achievement as the hopelessness outside the school begins to creep into the school itself and devalue the courses.

We often find different racial and cultural traditions, the absence of a common set of values and the presence of a different set of perceptions about discrimination and how people are treated, which does not make it any easier to solve the problems.

[Mr. John Fraser]

Too often, the inner city exhibits high levels of personal crime, such as burglaries, robberies and even murders, as well as drug and alcohol abuse and other forms of anti-social behaviour. Often there is antagonism between the police and sections of the community. Indeed, virtually every riot has been sparked off by a clash with the police, and usually a rescue from arrest. I am sorry to say that that phenomenon has occurred this spring.

Of course, all those elements exist in other parts of the country but the combustible nature of the inner cities, which burst into flames in the 1981 and 1985 riots, appears to be a function of the size of the cities as well as a constituent element of them. What happens in Lichfield will not happen in Liverpool, and vice versa. Size has something to do with the combustible nature of our inner-city problems.

I am worried that, as well as the dangers and deprivations of the inner cities, there is evidence that they are beginning to create their own momentum of new traditions and new patterns of accommodation to violence. The patterns are becoming more deeply entrenched as people begin to have to get used to a life without any reasonable possibility of wealth or work. One then gets to the stage when the character of the environment is determined by people as much as, according to the old theories, the character of people was determined by their environment. The facts create notoriety and then the notoriety begins to create fresh facts.

I shall cite an example from my constituency, but I have come across such cases in Manchester and elsewhere as well. Because of levels of crime and disorder, it becomes extremely difficult for some business people to obtain insurance. Without insurance, it is impossible to start or to continue a business. The original causes of criminal behaviour, which make it difficult to obtain insurance, lie in poverty and unemployment, but, as fewer people are able to obtain insurance and start new or maintain old businesses, the problem of unemployment and poverty becomes even that little bit more acute. That is just one example of the way in which the inner city can create its own negative momentum.

Every measure of inner-city deprivation is worsening, and not by accident—in many cases, because of the Government's deliberate action. The difference between 1979 and 1986 is that in 1979 there was hope. I had the feeling in my inner-city constituency that we were beginning to turn the corner—housing was improving and there was a hope that people would get jobs. However, since 1979, a different economic climate has made it much more difficult to solve inner-city problems.

When the Conservative party took office, unemployment in Lambeth was 7,000; by the riots in 1981 it had doubled; and, since then, it has doubled again. Between 1979 and 1986 unemployment has increased fourfold. In most inner-city areas, crime has escalated by two or three times the national level. This week, we read in our newspapers that the Conservative party, which at its last conference committed itself to more policemen on the streets and more resources to deal with crime, is cash limiting the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis in the same way as it cash limits Socialist town halls.

If unemployment and crime have soared, housing has nose-dived, leading to a doubling of levels of homelessness. Typically, the amount of money that local authorities may spend on housing, by means of their own housing and by improvement grants, has dropped by two thirds. The burdens, frustrations and tensions have been heaped on those who already bear more than their fair share of suffering.

Changes in housing benefit regulations have introduced new tensions between young people and their parents. The DHSS changes in board and lodging allowance have created the feeling that there is a vendetta against the young, who already have a great burden to carry. Increases in fares have made it more difficult for those who work to travel out of their areas. The Government's marathon battle against the teachers has done nothing to improve morale in our schools, which are feeling the backlash of the hopelessness of unemployment for many youths. I agree that owner-occupation is to be encouraged, but the latest announcement about the safety net for owner-occupiers will not help.

Until this year, rate support grant has been cut and rates have risen as a direct consequence of Government action. For example, six years ago Hackney had a rate support grant of £69 million. By last year that figure had dropped to £37 million, a cut of £32 million. The only compensation for Hackney was a £3·5 million increase in the urban programme, compared to a total loss of £65 million in rate support grant, housing subsidy and housing investment allocations. I do not think that the people of Hackney would say that one of their problems is that money has been thrown at them—quite the reverse.

Health care has suffered. In my constituency, King's College hospital is the biggest employer. It is our only major industry. Although that should be playing a significant part in inner city partnership policy, and we are told that the Ministers are all working together, I read in the London Standard this week that there is a "horrific situation" for National Health care in the hospital. The hospital says that it has a 110 per cent. occupancy of beds, which means that as one patient leaves another one takes the bed on the same day.

"On many occasions a patient has stood in the corridor outside the ward waiting for a nurse to change bed linen which is still warm from the last patient, so that he or she can then take that bed."

A consultant has been quoted as saying:

"Recently I had to turn away a coronary patient because we just had no bed available—and that patient died. The effects on the health service are immeasurable and the future will be awful."

There is a possibility that the neighbouring hospital of St. Thomas's may be closed for a large part of the year because of cuts.

We have two Government Departments which could be making a contribution to the inner cities. One could run through a great catalogue of Government action which has deeply intensified the distress, poverty and frustration of the inner city. The Government have penalised not only the people of the inner cities but their representatives, as in Lambeth and Liverpool.

My right hon. and hon. Friends and I have never argued that the Government do not care or that there have not been some responses to the challenge of the inner city. However, we say that their responses have been token—tranquillisers—and, in some cases, they have been gimmicks and wholly inadequate to meet the scale of the problem. The problems that have been imposed on the inner cities have far outweighed any of the advantages brought their way.

The argument that money has been thrown at the inner cities and has failed is simply not true. If one takes the total of current initiatives—urban regeneration grant, special employment initiatives and urban development grants—they do not add up to anything like the amount of money the Government have been prepared to put into one City bank, Johnson Matthey Bankers. The Government believe that the problems of the financial City deserve much more money than the problems of the inner city.

The responses to the riots in Brixton and Birmingham last year have been virtually non-existent in any positive sense and negative in that the resources which would have been made available to inner city areas have been diminished in London by the abolition of the Greater London council and the beggaring of thousands of voluntary groups, and in Birmingham the Government have been resisting the legal rights of Birmingham city council to resources under rate support grant. I warn the Government that the smouldering volcanoes of our inner cities remain just as dangerous this year as last year. I do not think that the Government have the correct perception as to the extent to which the cities could explode again. I hope that that does not happen because it does more damage than anything else I can think of in my area. However, the risk remains and the response to the problems of last year has been minimal.

Throughout the debate we have heard that money has been thrown at the inner cities. I want to refute that by giving a few figures. Firstly, I shall give the figures of an urban authority outside London—Newcastle upon Tyne—and compare the figures of 1981-82 with 1985-86. I am using constant 1985-86 prices. In 1981-82, Newcastle upon Tyne received rate support grant of £60 million. By last year, it had been reduced by £40 million, a reduction of 67 per cent. If one takes 12 urban authorities outside London, ranging from Birmingham to Sunderland, one sees that in total, between 1981-82 and 1985-86, those authorities lost £387 million in rate support grant, a cut of 30 per cent., which is not made up for by any inner city money. Tower Hamlets in London had £33 million of rate support grant in 1981-82. Last year it amounted to £18 million, a cut of 44 per cent. over the four years from 1981-82. Whichever local authority one looks at, one sees that nowhere have local authorities been compensated by increases in inner city partnership or programme money.

Let us take the total of all the partnership and programme authorities. In current values, the loss of block grant from 1981-82 to 1985-86 has represented a reduction of £427 million, compensated for by an increase in urban programme allocations of only £39 million. That utterly refutes the argument that money is being thrown at those places, or that they are awash with Government largesse. It is simply not true.

Coupled with that is something that affects the inner city badly, which one cannot exactly measure—the cut in purchasing power of the people who live there. That cut has come from increased taxation on the poor, increased rates, and falling employment. It is interesting to canvass in my constituency and the Fulham constituency, and to see the difference that high purchasing power makes in different areas. In my area, shops are rundown and there are problems in secondary shopping areas. In Fulham, because of the greater purchasing power that exists there, there is an entirely different pattern, with the development of property and the use of commercial and residential property. Therefore, there is no truth in the notion that money is being thrown at those areas and is making the problem worse.

What can we do to rescue the inner city?

Mr. Tony Banks: Get rid of the Tories.

Mr. Fraser: That is absolutely right. There is not a single measure of net improvement in the condition of the inner city to which the Government can point over seven years. They may talk about individual advances, but in total no net gain can be demonstrated by the Government.

First, we must recognise the massive scale of the problem, which has grown so quickly over these seven Tory years, and that in most cases the solution to the problem lies not only with individuals. There has to be an urban policy that comprises a comprehensive, co-ordinated attack on the web of interlocking factors that affect urban residents.

Mr. Heddle: What the hon. Gentleman is saying is echoed by the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks). He is devaluing the currency of the debate if that is what he is telling the House. Is he saying that the inner city problem started on 3 May 1979? Did it not exist when he was a Front Bench spokesman in the Government between 1974 and 1979? Did it not exist after the war, when perhaps he was a member of the Labour League of Youth?

Mr. Fraser: Of course, the problem existed during the period of that Labour Government. I had the privilege of serving on the Cabinet Committee that put together the 1977 White Paper on the inner cities. The difference is this. In 1979, there was hope, and in 1986 there is despair, because we are living in an entirely different economic environment. I do not say that the Government do not care and that the problem has been created in the past seven years, but I say that the possibility of curing the problem is immeasurably less now than when the Labour party left office.

The Government must adopt a single, coherent, co-ordinated strategy for each inner city area; the strategy will differ from one area to another. There must be a corporate urban strategy. It is no good the Manpower Services Commission opening a new training facility in Deptford when the DHSS is closing a hospital there. Of course, often we find the MSC closing a training facility and the DHSS closing a hospital.

It is no good the Department of the Environment agreeing to an urban programme and then penalising a local authority for its 25 per cent. contribution to the programme. It is no good the Department saying that a project has been a success and then penalising the local authority because the project goes into its main programme. It is no good giving money to a local authority to put down pink paving stones, which I have seen in Lambeth, Southwark and Sunderland, and denying the authority money to put slates on the roofs of the houses that adjoin the road where the environmental improvements are being made.

It is no good talking about industrial regeneration in Birmingham when the Department of Education and Science slaughters facilities at Aston university, which was a generator of industrial innovation. There was a chance of a partnership with that university and there are chances of partnerships between polytechnics and local authorities to regenerate industry, but the DES is closing establishments that stimulate new industrial ideas.

The contradictions of Government policy are legion and we must have a meaningful, coherent, corporate strategy from the Government, led by a single Minister. We are not even sure who is in charge. Sometimes we think that it is the Chancellor of the Exchequer; sometimes we are told that it is the Secretary of State for Employment; sometimes we think that it is the Secretary of State for the Environment. No one is really sure who is taking the lead.

The Government must also cut out the gimmicks. For example, it is no good the Government telling us that privatisation of council properties in inner cities will make the slightest contribution to solving the overall housing problem. With privatisation, the Government solve the problem of the property without solving the problem of the people.

Privatisation schemes in inner cities do not lead to the comprehensive housing of which the hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) spoke. They lead to more ghettoisation as those who are unable to buy homes are squeezed into denser blocks of ghettoised and residualised flats. It is not the change in tenure that matters, but the change in conditions.

At local level, partnership remains the best approach. The partners will be not merely central and local government, but the professions, voluntary and community groups, trade unions and commerce and industry. Each partner needs to recognise its strengths and weaknesses. For example, local authorities are not always best equipped to make decisions on investment and business, any more than businesses are best equipped to make decisions about projects and their social consequences. People must work together and recognise the contributions that each can make. Architects and town planners have strengths, but they also have weaknesses and they can discover their weaknesses by going into partnership with community groups and those who will occupy the houses, estates and environments that the professions are designing.

In some cases inner city renewal agencies may be the least bureaucratic and the most effective instrument of change. That is certainly true of the Greater London Enterprise Board, but the agencies must take local government with them and not bypass local councils.

We must have clarity in our objectives and ask what particular expenditure is intended to achieve. I say to Labour authorities as well as to the Government that we must not be afraid to monitor value for money and the proper conduct of agencies, whether public, private or voluntary, that use funds that are supposed to regenerate the inner city. Of course, we must take chances. Excessive caution in spending on new initiatives would be silly, but we must not be afraid to evaluate expenditure and to monitor performance.

I am in favour of the state principle — the idea of putting money into regenerating the inner cities, which would allow them to generate their own resources. In some cases, the resources could be provided by industry and commerce. In other cases, they will come from private money, perhaps from voluntary organisations. In the most impoverished areas, the only resources available will be commitment and effort. I am a great believer in the principle of people putting a stake and commitment into the inner cities by forming businesses, committing themselves and risking their futures as well as public money. That is the sort of partnership and commitment that we need.

The Scarman reforms must continue. It is a great pity — a judge observed this recently — that racial discrimination is not a reason for dismissal. There must be a more imaginative approach to recruiting black people into the police force. I do not question the fact that there is a commitment in principle, but the Metropolitan police must consider the success of the GLC and boroughs such as Lambeth in recruiting from the racial minorities. The Metropolitan police should also consider the successful approach adopted in the United States. It is not good enough to have a police force that does not reflect the general racial composition of the population that it serves.

All hon. Members would agree that poverty and unemployment are the most haunting spirits in the inner cities. We cannot cure the problem by removing money from the inner cities, but I also agree that we cannot cure all problems by expenditure. We must examine the patterns of behaviour which are a cause as well as a consequence of inner-city problems, and we must develop a policy that helps favourable patterns of behaviour in the inner cities. Sometimes it can be done through sport, leisure or the arts. People develop a pride in what they can achieve for themselves in the arts or sport. It is even more important when there is mass unemployment. Sometimes it can be done through co-operatives, tenants' organisations, clubs and societies.

We must invest people with a sense of achievement, dignity and self-respect and the feeling that they are, in practice as well as in theory, governing themselves. There is a destructive streak in our inner cities, but people destroy that which they do not believe is theirs. If they believe that it is theirs—if there is a stake, commitment or involvement — they are much less likely to be destructive and will want to preserve their environment.

It is terribly important to create small businesses. Lambeth is often reviled, but the council has used much urban aid money to support 1,000 new businesses, many involving black business men and workers. Some will fail and fall off the log, but the successful businesses will have a greater stake in the local community.

One of the worst problems of the inner city is that not only do people know that their conditions are bad, but they believe they have little ability to control them. If we are to develop a new coherent set of values in the inner city, and develop the visionary fervour of William Blake, that fervour and those values must grow from the people themselves. They cannot be imposed.

There is a contradiction that, despite the unpleasantness and bad conditions of life in the inner city, it is often vibrant. One problem of my area is not that people want to move out, but that they want to move in. There must be values and a belief in the inner city. We must get people to believe that they can create a new Jerusalem in Liverpool, Manchester and London. I shall work for that. A combination of values and expenditure will save us from what otherwise would be a dim and dismal future for the centres of our great urban areas.

2.4 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mrs. Angela Rumbold): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) for initiating the debate. It has been hard-hitting and interesting, and I have listened to it with great interest and attention. I congratulate my hon. Friend on the manner in which he introduced the motion. I hope that he and his son have both recovered from the shock of the attack that they suffered at Wembley last week. I hope that his son will not have unpleasant memories of British life.

I should like to describe how the Government are attempting to respond to some of the problems of the inner cities and the housing problem. I will try to answer some of the other issues that have been raised as well.

The hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) rightly said that it is difficult to define inner city problems. There are many cities with similar difficulties, but we must be careful not to assume that all cities are the same. I utterly reject his analysis of how the Government have responded to those problems. I also reject the assumption made by many Opposition Members that the Government's insistence on initiating partnership between the private and public sectors is causing the problem.

The hon. Gentleman rightly said that there is a great deal of hope in our cities, but he insisted that we could solve the problems only by putting public money into housing, city centres and local government. In 1979, we had to sit down and work out why previous efforts had failed and to try to find a different approach.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) mentioned partnerships, and said that many people have failed to attack the problems of inner cities. He mentioned Ministers who, from 1968 to 1981, have made identical statements. He also said that junior Ministers seem to end up going to designated districts and that senior Ministers go to better programme and partnership areas. He said that partnerships were in essence between Government Departments and local authorities. That is not quite true—partnerships meet the voluntary sector.

Partnership and programme authorities produce inner area programmes which set strategy and list schemes on which the private sector, chambers of commerce, the voluntary sector and the Sports Council, for example, are consulted before they are approved. Partnership authorities have been seen to work. Indeed, the hon. Member for Norwood pointed to them as a solution. They have been made to work in Birmingham, where local authorities of whatever political outlook have met with success. By contrast, a local authority that does not have a positive attitude towards partnership, Liverpool, has slammed the door on co-operation and the offer of assistance. That seems to be why it is adding to its urban degeneration rather than to urban regeneration.

The Government are guided by four main principles in targeting assistance on inner cities. First, they seek to target assistance on the most needy areas where results can be seen, and stimulus given to wider regeneration. Secondly, the Government are convinced that it is of great assistance to keep regulation and intervention by central and local government to a minimum. That concentrates activity on creating the right climate for investment and enterprise. Thirdly, we must build up business confidence by tackling dereliction, by pump-priming investment and by improving local labour skills. The Government have consciously made efforts to improve all those aspects. Fourthly, we want to help to make urban areas places where people want to live and industry wants to be. Indeed, I echo the view of the hon. Member for Norwood that people want to stay in inner cities because they are attractive places to live. Therefore, we must emphasise the importance of attracting skilled people back into those areas, of improving job prospects for those already there, and of reinforcing residents' pride in their community. Those are fundamental and important objectives.

At the heart of our urban strategy is the recognition that to achieve the regeneration of inner city areas priority must be given to creating a climate in which the private sector is encouraged, and the spirit of enterprise and innovation is engendered.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the Minister reaffirm that, in seeking to reduce exclusive decision-making by central and local government, important principles are accountability for what is decided and the participation of local people in those decisions? Otherwise, the private sector or development corporations and the like act unaccountably and inconsistently with the views of the communities whom they seek to regenerate.

Mrs. Rumbold: In essence that is exactly the partnership principle, and one which I am happy to reaffirm within that context.

The main thrust of our policies is geared to providing the means to improve the quality of the local environment, the living conditions and the skill levels which will make urban areas attractive both to local entrepreneurs and inward investors as places to develop and expand their businesses.

We have heard about urban development corporations, and they are good examples of the Government's policy of encouraging opportunity. They have not relied simply on public money to secure regeneration, although those sums have been substantial. By the end of 1985-86 some £250 million of public money will have been directed to the redevelopment of London's derelict dockland areas.

Mr. Tony Banks: No accountability.

Mrs. Rumbold: I know that the hon. Gentleman will say that there is no accountability, but he should visit London's derelict dockland areas which were derelict for years and see what is springing up and how splendid it is. A similar achievement has been gained in the Merseyside development corporation area, where more than 3·3 million visitors went to the Liverpool international garden festival.

Mr Simon Hughes: What about the people who live there?

Mrs. Rumbold: Indeed, the people who live there are, obviously, net beneficiaries of such urban improvements.

The urban development corporations represent the Government's willingness to commit substantial public funds to carefully targeted initiatives to encourage investment. Ministers are often asked whether there are to be any further UDCs. I am not sure whether there are sufficient places that share the characteristics of London and Liverpool docklands, but we can look at the experiences to see whether there is any possibility, without replicating the machinery, of encouraging such development.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) acknowledged that Coin street has received official approval from the Department of the Environment, just as Lambeth borough council has received official approval for the payment of housing association grant to the Mulberry housing association. I am sure that he will be glad to see that.

The hon. Member also asked me about parish councils and I suspect that he wanted to ask about accountability. There are no plans to introduce parish, neighbourhood and community councils into the London area. I am sure that he will be sad to hear that I am an unrepentant advocate of the first-past-the-post system of elections. I do not find the local elections a persuasive reason for changing the system of our electoral law.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Even if I cannot persuade the hon. Lady during this Parliament about electoral reform, will she look again at introducing parish councils in London? There is great public demand for them.

Mrs. Rumbold: I take the hon. Gentleman's point.

Much has been said about the urban programme and it has grown substantially since 1979, from an allocation of £90 million to one of over £300 million. In this financial year, the urban programme will provide, in the major urban areas, 900 small workplace units, 800 business starts, 1,600 grants and loans to firms, creating or retaining 24,000 jobs. This facility is appreciated and used. I have seen it in cities such as Nottingham, Leicester, Liverpool and Bradford. The urban programme will help to reclaim some 2,500 acres of derelict land and improve vacant or underused buildings.

The House may have noticed speculation about the responsibility for making urban policy, but discussions about urban issues involve a substantial proportion of the Ministers on the Government's payroll. Urban problems cover health and social services and law and order, both of which we have heard much about today, education, race, employment, training, and industrial and transport issues. The response to the range of urban problems that have been vividly described by hon. Members has to be flexible and grounded in carefully tuned and targeted programmes.

For this reason, we have established city action teams to pull together the programmes from the Departments of the Environment, Trade and Industry and Employment and the Manpower Services Commission. We can be proud of this because here, as with other Government programmes, the aim is to learn and apply lessons about the direction of the large public sums that are going into the inner city areas through a variety of programmes. It is important to see that that money goes to those who most need it.

We have heard much about the depressing sight in so many of our older towns and cities of acres of derelict and underused land. This is a waste of resources, and something that the Government have been determined to attack. The land register systems have helped to attack this problem and the Government have paid a great deal of attention to ensure that land holdings by Departments and the nationalised industries and the statutory undertakers are reviewed regularly with a view to disposing of surplus land as quickly as possible. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has encouraged local authorities to take a similarly positive attitude. It is a disgrace that so much land remains in public ownership and is not used as it should be.

The Government are changing policy towards the derelict land reclamation programme. The fact is that 45 per cent. of all land used for housing is on either previously developed or unused land within built-up areas. We wish to bring this land into use to resist the pressure on companies to move out into the green belt. This should be seen as a positive move. Since 1979 we have doubled, in real terms, the resources that are made available for derelict land reclamation. They have been increased from £23 million in 1979 to £78 million during the current financial year. The derelict land grant is absolutely critical to encouraging private investment and it has been successful. There is much more investment in the inner cities now than there was in the past. Our aim is to reclaim sites where we believe that new development will be possible.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Hams referred to the need to relax the planning restrictions in the inner cities. This would help to relieve pressure on the green belt. In recent years we have tried to change attitudes towards planning by emphasising that the system must provide properly for both housing and industrial development while maintaining well-established conservation policies. That is an exceedingly important part of our remit. We have challenged the assumption that planning exists primarily to restrict or prevent development. Its proper purpose is to ensure efficiency and economy in the use of development land. We are keeping up the pressure on local authorities to improve their performance in handling planning applications.

The Government have also examined the urban development grant. We have a good story to tell about our support of individual projects. About 179 projects are bringing in £350 million of private investment in return for £85 million of public sector investment. This has created 20,000 jobs, half of which are commercial while the other half are industrial. The Government have also supported the provision of 3,500 homes. I do not know how it can be said that this Government have made no effort to support urban regeneration and urban renewal. The grants that we have made have led to the development of derelict and disused land, and private business must be encouraged to use that land.

The hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) referred to Trafford park. It was set up in the 1890s as a major industrial estate. It is situated at the head of the Manchester ship canal. The hon. Gentleman complains about the large amount of urban dereliction in his area. However, the Trafford park major manufacturers' group has persuaded the Trafford borough council, the Department of Trade and Industry and my Department each to invest £25,000 in the Trafford park investment strategy. I hope that that will be of some comfort to him.

The hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) referred to an area that both he and I know. He said that he thought that lack of local authority public expenditure had led to housing dereliction in the area. I do not agree with him, but I must now turn to a matter that must be raised. In this debate, the right to buy has been referred to as an absolutely essential choice that ought to be available to those who live in the inner cities. Nobody who is familiar with the inner cities can doubt the importance of humanising some of the council estates which have displaced private housing in so many areas. The right to buy is designed to introduce variety in the place of uniformity. It enables people to look after their own homes instead of having to rely upon remote housing departments to do it for them. Many right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House have complained today about the dereliction that is caused by long-distance maintenance and long-distance accountability. Therefore, it is important to look at the impact that the right to buy has produced.

Mr. Raynsford: Will the hon. Lady address the point that I raised earlier about why the Government refused to extend the right to buy to private tenants, who often live in appalling, derelict conditions, in homes that are not being properly maintained by their landlords?

Mrs. Rumbold: I shall be coming to that point in a moment.

The major impact on inner cities will come not just from the right to buy houses but from the right to buy flats. Flats represent only 4 per cent. of all sales and it is not hard to see why. A tenant buying a flat still has to look to the landlord to maintain and manage the rest of the block and has to contribute to the service charges and the landlord's maintenance costs. But we are planning to help tenants to do just that.

The Housing and Planning Bill, which has now completed its first stages through this House, provides for a higher discount on flats sold under the right to buy. For a tenant with a minimum qualifying period of two years, the new scale will start at 44 per cent. and will rise by 2 per cent. for each additional year of the tenant's qualifying period to a maximum of 70 per cent. Thus, a tenant of 15 years' standing will qualify for a maximum discount. I shall be surprised if that is not an extremely popular and well-taken-up provision.

The Bill also provides for tenants buying flats to have better protection against high service charges and we are confident that many tenants will see this as a satisfactory method of ensuring homes for people in need, not least those in later life.

We did not underrate the difficulty of introducing owner-occupation on a large scale into high-rise council blocks, but it is well worth trying and the Bill gives tenants of flats solid encouragement.

To back that up, one must point to the London borough of Wandsworth and its great success in the way that it has managed its housing. A balanced sales policy has provided the capital to pull up the private sector and to upgrade its public sector. Receipts are ploughed back into the public sector and they provide local infrastructure. They improve the environment and help to guarantee jobs. Anyone who went through Wandsworth eight years ago and does so again today cannot fail to see the changes that that successful local authority has produced by its imaginative sale of council houses, ploughing the money that it has received back into the public sector, ensuring that the environment and the infrastructure are right.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mrs. Rumbold: It is essential that that policy is pursued because it has proven to be a great success.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Hams also mentioned the right to rent and short tenancies. Hon. Members have reported and spoken about a number of council properties today that have been reduced in recent years in response to Government pressure, but there is still a scandalously high number. Therefore, I sympathise with my hon. Friend's suggestion that there should be a right to rent. However, there are difficulties which must not be brushed on one side. For example, a single person on a waiting list could become a tenant of a four-bedroomed house which had been empty for a specified time just ahead of a large needy family which was waiting to clock up its qualifying period of registration.

The urban housing renewal programme is highly successful. The private rented sector should play a greater role in providing housing choice.

We were told by the hon. Member for Fulham (Mr. Raynsford) that shorthold tenures have not been successful but it is mainly because they have been obstructed by the rather doctrinal policies of many Labour authorities that they have not had the success that they deserve. Moreover, in response to his rather spurious point that sales make it more difficult for local authorities to house those in need, I should say that most of those who have bought would have been likely to remain in their present homes anyway as tenants and therefore would not have released housing.

The debate has been interesting, but nothing has been suggested by those on the Opposition Benches that would do more than that which the Government have done to tackle the problems of the inner cities.

2.29 pm

Mr. Heddle: I thank my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for her reply, and all hon. Members on both sides of the House for ensuring that the debate has been basically constructive and good natured in the true tradition of Friday business. I am bound to say that I think that the debate was marred earlier by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) raising specious——

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Royal Ordnance Factories

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

2.35 pm

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): In 1575 Francis Lee, who was one of the four master gunners in the Tower of London, petitioned the Privy Council for permission to import saltpetre to start the manufacture of gunpowder. In his petition, after some very polite remarks, he began with a quotation from the first book of Samuel, chapter 13, verse 19:

"There was no Smith found throughout the land of Israel lest the Hebrews should make them swords and spears."

He then said:

"So now no powder made for her Highness in England, but provision made out of foreign part as of late from Barbary, Hamburg and Antwerp which provisions in the time of the Duke D'Alva were cut off."

Nothing changes because the royal ordnance factories today are in exactly that position. We have a Government who pretend, at extraordinary length, that they are concerned with the defence of the realm—yet they are prepared, quite cheerfully and without proper thought, to hand over the future of the defence of this country to any manufacturer of arms anywhere in the world.

We all know that the ROFs have gone through an exceedingly difficult time. I am especially concerned about the ROF at Radway Green, which is close to my constituency and where many of my constituents work. The reality is that all the ROFs are dedicated to their work, and have been ever since their creation long before the time of Elizabeth I when the privately-provided gunpowder to the Armada was found not to be effective. The state armories and ordnances have fulfilled their tasks admirably.

This Government, unlike any other of any complexion, regard the ROFs as a suitable asset to be flogged off in the market place. They were first put through the procedure of being made private companies and they are now to be floated in July. It is important that we should understand exactly what is happening. The Ministry of Defence—which, after all, is the main customer of the ROFs—is behaving in the most arbitrary and extraordinary manner. Its own figures reveal that 60 million rounds of ammunition were purchased abroad in 1985 and 1986. The MOD says that it moved from the 1 per cent. that it used to buy abroad to about 24 per cent. by 1985 because it is looking for a much better deal for the taxpayer and good value for money.

Quite frankly, it is extraordinary that the ammunition factory at Radway Green, which is the only factory producing small arms and ammunition, has never stopped the flow of that ammunition because of industrial action. It has provided ammunition which has been used in the Falklands and in Northern Ireland, and which has always ensured that the British Army is properly equipped. Yet recently there was an extraordinary incident of the MOD placing an order with a Belgian firm, only to be met with industrial action so that it could not have delivery of its order.

The MOD is in control of the orders for the ROFs. The percentage of small arms orders placed abroad has risen but, since the beginning of April, 2·7 million more rounds of small arms ammunition have been purchased. There is a good indication that already we may have filled the 10 per cent. of orders we were told would be placed elsewhere. The ROF not only has an empty order book but, at Radway Green, has already laid off workers. It is possible that those skilled workers will be dispersed yet further if orders are not forthcoming.

The royal ordnance factories are the only source of the United Kingdom's small arms ammunition. The Minister talks about getting good value for money, but it is important that he should tell us also what will happen if ROF Radway Green does not get sufficient orders to make it viable in the coming transitional period. It is all very well to say that, when it becomes a private company, it will be able to compete with any company abroad. We know that even the Government and those companies abroad with which the Government have placed orders are almost entirely, with one exception, run, subsidised and controlled by the Governments of those countries. The Government have been buying from the Portuguese, from one private German firm, which is part of the Flick empire—that should give many people pause for thought—from Raufoss in Norway, which is not only an efficient but an expensive company, and from the Greek Powder and Cartridge Company.

I have asked more than once whether we are convinced that the end-user certificate will ensure that the ammunition that is being bought is genuine and that there will be monitoring all down the line, but I have not yet received adequate answers.

It is important to understand that, if the ROF's order books are controlled by the Government, the ROFs need to be given some protection. At the moment, they are getting the worst of all worlds. They no longer have the relationship of a state factory to a Government, and their individual workers are no longer protected by being civil servants—indeed, many are suffering because of that. Nevertheless, the Government seek to dictate the size of the orders and threaten to place their orders abroad, presumably in the sacred name of competition. There is a real danger if this nation is dependent on supplies from overseas or, alternatively, if we have factories which have been run down to such an extent that they are no longer viable.

The royal ordnance factories developed not only rifles but many specific items because the relationship was of civil servants to Government. We now face the frightening situation in which the Government use those detailed statistics and that information to allow foreign companies to tender in opposition to the ROFs for British orders and to use that commercial information to produce the same type of goods for sale in other countries—in effect, using the ROFs' intellectual copyright. Any other Government would be deeply ashamed of that extraordinary development.

There has already been a downward revision of the amounts to be raised from the sale of the ROFs' assets. Not only will there not be an enormous amount of money made available for other purposes, but this important defence asset will be flogged off without any obvious advantage.

The Ministry of Defence has kept the ROFs in considerable suspense, presumably negotiating with them for individual contracts, but giving them little leeway in the move from being a state-owned to a private company, or any indication of the size of the orders that will be placed with them. I would not like to accuse Ministers of behaving like silly boys, but I wonder whether it is true that a question tabled last night is to be answered today, after the debate has taken place, giving some information about an order to be placed at Radway Green, which will be the equivalent of only one year's order, not the three-year package that royal ordnance factories have been seeking. If that is so, it is an abuse of the facilities of the House.

I, in common with my hon. Friends, have been questioning the Minister for about four months about the way in which the company is to be floated, the size of the order books, from where the ammunition is being brought, what facilities will be available, and what will happen to the people in the factories. I have been given the most extraordinarily obtuse and, in some cases, contradictory answers. If, on the eve of my raising this matter on the Floor of the House, the Minister puts a written answer into the Lobby which gives one part of the information but not all of the commitments that are being asked for by royal ordnance factories, then he is behaving disgracefully and many people will find that difficult to accept.

Mr. Lewis Carter-Jones (Eccles): My hon. Friend is trying to get answers from the Minister from whom I have been trying to get answers for the past 18 months. My hon. Friend has made a strong case for Radway Green, but I want to make a case for all royal ordnance factories. As my hon. Friend has clearly demonstrated, morale is declining. Morale has gone down even further because of the failure of the Government to give answers on pension rights and their failure to respond to my hon. Friend and people like myself who are seeking firm commitments on pensions. The Minister must now come clean, as my hon. Friend is asking.

Mrs. Dunwoody: I am afraid that the point made by my hon. Friend can be repeated over and over again. The people working in the factories no longer have any security of tenure. They no longer have any response from the Government to the commitment that they have shown over many years. Many of them have accepted lower rates of pay in return for the satisfaction of doing a job that they thought was important for the country, a job which, after all, replenished the stores after the Falklands war and made it possible for the Government to exercise political opportunism in the south Atlantic. In many instances they are now thanked by being put out on the stones. That is a clear indication of the Government's attitude.

In replies to me, the Minister always says that he will take account of the national interest. He says that, as to future orders, negotiations are now at an advanced stage and that he expects them to result in further substantial contracts and that he will let me know when that stage has been reached.

It is not good enough. The Conservative Government have made plain, for as long as I have been in politics, their belief in a proper defence for the realm and in properly organised provision for the armed services. They have now behaved in probably the most hypocritical and irresponsible way that it is possible for any Government to behave. They intend to treat these units as if they are some simple asset to be sold off. They have not taken account of the national interest. They will deprive this country of proper conventional arms and, at the time of the next general election, I expect they will tell the electors that they cannot possibly trust anyone else because the Conservative party is the only one to understand the need to defend the British people. The Government must give us a commitment for continuing employment in the royal ordnance factories, and give us some indication that the Government will not simply behave in this arbitrary and unbalanced way. We might then begin to believe that the Government seriously care about the future of the defence of this country. Unless we have those assurances, we shall know, in simple terms, that to this Government any asset, whether a defence asset, the protection of the people or whatever, can be sold off for filthy lucre and, at the end of the day, it will be presented as a great advance when we all know that it is utter hypocrisy.

2.49 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. John Lee): Despite the tone of some of her comments, I still congratulate the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) on securing the opportunity to raise this important matter in the House. I well understand her genuine concern for her constituents who work at the small arms ammunition factory at Radway Green, and for the future of royal ordnance factories as a whole.

Without wishing to be unduly pedantic, I should like to say, however, that we are no longer involved in the sale of the royal ordnance factories. We have created a new company—Royal Ordnance plc.

I am pleased that this afternoon my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Dover) is with us. He has a deep concern for his constituents who work at the royal ordnance factory at Chorley and others in Lancashire. The hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones) is also here, and I know of his deep concern, too, for his constituents who work at the royal ordnance factory at Patricroft, which he knows I have visited.

There are many positive arguments in favour of the change of status of Royal Ordnance. The resources available to defence are always limited, and, as this week's White Paper made clear, it is an important task for the Ministry of Defence to get the best value for money. That means that we must look for taut and efficient contractors, and we must look to the pressures of competition to ensure that we get the best defence out of the resources we put in. We believe that it is only by being in the private sector that Royal Ordnance can best respond to those competitive pressures and it is essential for its future development and prosperity that it does respond to those pressures.

It is undeniable that the capacity of Royal Ordnance is greater than is necessary solely to meet the needs of the Ministry of Defence. It has been the case for some years now that the organisation has to sell its products abroad if it hopes to utilise all its available capacity. There have been some notable successes in the past as well as the unfortunate effects of Iran. But Royal Ordnance's future depends critically on its ability to export. That means that it must become increasingly competitive, and that requires the structure, personnel and drive to identify its markets and to export into them successfully.

The Government decided that the best way of securing the future of Royal Ordnance and of exploiting its undoubted potential was to turn it into a fully fledged commercial company. As a result, the Ordnance Factories and Military Services Act was passed in 1984. Under the terms of the Act, the Government made a scheme which took effect on 2 January 1985 and which transferred to Royal Ordnance the assets and liabilities of the trading fund and of research and development facilities at Westcott and Waltham Abbey together with the associated rocket motor production factory at Summerfield. On 22 October last year, my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement made clear our intention to move the whole company into the private sector by means of flotation of the shares subject to prevailing trading and stock market conditions. Although no final decisions have been taken on the flotation, I should like to describe some of the progress we have made since the creation of Royal Ordnance plc.

First, the people. We had earlier appointed a new chairman of the former royal ordnance factories to help supervise their transition into a company. Once vesting day was successfully past and the company was in a new environment, we concluded that it would be right to bring in a different expertise to see the company through the process of a flotation on the stock market. Mr. Bryan Basset was appointed chairman of Royal Ordnance plc in July last year. On 1 April this year, we appointed a new chief executive with wide private sector experience essential to the future development of the organisation, Mr. Roger Pinnington. They join other individuals who have been brought in from the private sector because of their particular expertise in various aspects of business and, of course, they join the wealth of experience which already exists in Royal Ordnance and which will be the foundation of its future success. The head office has been slimmed down and the company is run by a smaller board with four non-executive directors comprising Lord King, Sir Arnold Hall, Air Chief Marshall Sir Douglas Lowe, and Field Marshal Sir John Stanier.

There have also been some important organisational changes. The company is now structured into four divisions — ammunition, small arms, explosives, and weapons and fighting vehicles. The research and development side of the company has started to be expanded. The explosives division already had within it significant R and D resources transferred from the Ministry of Defence, but the newly appointed R and D director has the job of continuing the expansion of the expertise in the other areas of the company's business and ensuring the healthy growth of private venture R and D expenditure.

The second area of particular expansion has been in sales and marketing. In the past, those functions had been carried out within the Ministry of Defence but Royal Ordnance has since April 1983 taken over responsibility for its sales and set in hand the development of a full-scale marketing organisation. As evidence of the success of the new approach within Royal Ordnance, export orders for ammunition won competitively in 1985 amounted to well over £100 million. That represented a major increase in the level of orders achieved in previous years.

The company is presently in the process of putting the finishing touches to the presentation of its 1985 accounts. They will set out in more detail the success achieved, and the prospectus that we are preparing will describe more fully than I can in the short time available to me where the company has got to in its transformation and its prospects.

The hon. Lady raised the whole question of ammunition procurement. As the House will be aware, we have in recent years been adjusting our approach to ammunition procurement to reflect the commercial status of Royal Ordnance. It was appropriate, when the royal ordnance factories formed part of the Ministry of Defence, for the factories to supply, to the limit of their ability and capacity, the armed services' requirements for ammunition as for other commodities in their product range. This was known as the preferred source policy.

However, as I stated earlier, it is now our policy to secure the economies of competitive procurement across the range of defence equipment, and ammunition procurement has been affected by this process. In the latter context, our aim has been to develop competition progressively, and we have consulted Royal Ordnance over our intentions in this respect. In the financial year 1985-86 we put about 10 per cent. of the former preferred source programme to competition and Royal Ordnance succeeded in winning about half of the contracts in question, in addition to the 90 per cent. of the programme which it was awarded non-competitively. We propose to build upon this promising beginning, and in this respect we foresee a continuing requirement for ammunition at or slightly above the present level.

I know that the hon. Lady is particularly concerned about small arms ammunition, which is manufactured at Royal Ordnance plc's factory at Radway Green in Cheshire. She will know that we have in recent weeks been in discussion with the company concerning future requirements for small arms ammunition. As I announced in a written reply today in response to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton), I am pleased to confirm that it has now been decided to award several major contracts worth about £35 million to the factory for 5·56 mm and 7·62 mm ammunition, representing the balance of our foreseen requirements until April next year. We remain in discussion with the company concerning our requirements for subsequent years.

The nature of the business of Royal Ordnance and the importance of its products to the defence of the United Kingdom is such that we would not wish to see control of the company passing into foreign hands. During the many debates on the passage of the Bill, the Government made clear their determination to ensure adequate control over foreign ownership, which we intend to exercise by the creation of a special share. We are entirely satisfied that strict vetting of share applications, coupled with the provisions of the Companies Act and Royal Ordnance's articles of association, will apply to protect the Government's position.

There is one aspect of that control on which I should like to tell the House of a revision in the Government's thinking. Our intention had been to amend the articles of association to include limitations on foreign shareholdings and also on disposals of assets over a certain level. On the latter point, we had previously indicated that we thought the right level at which the Government's agreement would be necessary was 15 per cent. of the company's assets. On further reflection, we have concluded that the level should be 25 per cent. This would bring the position into line with that we have adopted on other privatisations, such as Cable and Wireless, Amersham International, Sealink, and Jaguar, where such control was appropriate. Twenty-five per cent. is also the level at which under stock exchange rules the agreement of the majority of shareholders is required to the disposal of its assets.

As with any other defence contractor, numbers employed at Royal Ordnance have always been dependent on efficiency and the order book. Therefore, I must make it clear that employment levels are now a matter for the company to decide in the light of commercial factors. Sadly, some 1,500 redundancies have occurred this year, 550 of them at Radway Green.

Finally, concern was expressed by the hon. Member for Eccles over the pension rights of Royal Ordnance employees; there are still one or two outstanding issues to be settled. The Royal Ordnance pension arrangements provide a very secure basis for a fully index-linked scheme. We have, however, accepted that the ability of RO to reduce contributions if, for example, the company was doing badly is a change from the terms of the principal Civil Service pension scheme. Our advice is that the risk of this occurring is insubstantial and so remote as to be unquantifiable, but, to honour our commitment that there should be no detriment in the scheme, we have offered to pay a nominal sum of £100 to each RO plc employee who transferred out of the PCSPS on 2 January 1985. The payment would be full and final compensation for the risk of detriment occurring and reflects the advice that a court award, if made at all, would be a notional one only. The trade unions are currently considering this offer.

In conclusion, I acknowledge the substantial changes that have taken place in Royal Ordnance plc and pay tribute to the way in which management and employees at all levels have responded to the challenge. I wish them all good fortune in the future.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at Three o'clock.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Crown Court, Cambridge

Sir Eldon Griffiths asked the Attorney-General what proposals he has to locate a new Crown court in Cambridge; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The courtrooms now available for use by the Crown Court in Cambridge and Wisbech are expected to meet requirements until after the year 2000 AD. Although the quality of the accommodation is lacking in some respects other areas have more urgent needs for additional accommodation and must take priority. There is no immediate intention to provide a new building for the Crown Court in Cambridge, but the situation will be kept under review.

Land Registration

Mr. Rooker asked the Attorney-General when he expects to bring forward legislation based upon the Law Commission's report No. 148 in respect of land registration.

The Attorney-General: Comments on the Law Commission's proposals are being received. The Government will make a decision as to whether to give effect to the proposals when the comments have been fully considered.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend is content with the current arrangements and has no plans to change them. This is, however, one of the subjects on which a Sub-Committee of the Treasury and Civil Service Committee has heard evidence; my right hon. Friend will of course study the Committee's report when it is received.

Mr. Wallace asked the Prime Minister whether Her Majesty's Government have any plans to sponsor the erection of a national memorial to the United Kingdom service men who lost their lives in the Korean war; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply. The Ministry of Defence is already providing full support to the Korean Veterans Association in its plans to erect such a memorial at St. Paul's, which is to be financed by public subscription.

Libya (United States Attack)

Mr. Nellist asked the Prime Minister what is the latest number of (a) messages of support and (b) expressions of opposition received by the Government in connection with the use of British bases for the United States attack on Libya.

Mr. Spearing asked the Prime Minister if Her Majesty's Government notified the Security Council of the use of bases in the United Kingdom for the air attack on Libya in accordance with article 51 of the United Nations charter.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been asked to reply.

No. The obligation to report measures taken in exercise of the right of self-defence applied to the United States, which, as my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton) told the House on 24 April, reported to the Secretary-General on 14 April.

Anglo-Irish Agreement

Mr. McNamara asked the Prime Minister how many meetings have taken place between herself and Unionist leaders since 15 November 1985; how many letters she has received from Unionist leaders; and how many she has sent, since that date.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

Since 15 November my right hon. Friend has met the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) and the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) once. My right hon. (2) why, pursuant to her reply to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), Official Report, 18 April, column 525, on plutonium use, Her Majesty's Government's policy in answering such questions has altered since 4 February 1983.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend will reply on her return from Tokyo.

In addition, over the same period, my Department has used the services of Charles Barker Advertising for the placing of statutory notices and recruitment advertising at a total cost of £3,330,000.

Vehicle Registration Prefix

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Transport if his Department has calculated the financial effect to the motor industry of a change of vehicle prefix registration date from August to October.

Mr. Michael Spicer: There is no basis for making such a calculation since the view of a major part of the motor industry has been that October would overall be the most beneficial alternative to the present August change. The amount of notice given should allow the industry as a whole ample time to adjust to the new month of change. However if the industry on a whole now wants another arrangement we are prepared to consider it.

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will list the representations from the motor industry to his Department in favour of a change of vehicle prefix date from August to October;

(2) if he will list the representations from the motor industry to his Department against a change of vehicle prefix date from August to October.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply to him on 30 April and to my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Conway) on 1 May.

Tractors (Driving Licences)

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce legislation to permit a person aged 16 years in possession of a provisional driving licence, obtained to drive a tractor, to drive a tractor on the public highway in order to gain driving experience before the day of any driving test, and to permit any person with a driving licence to accompany that person; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: No, I am not satisfied that such a change would be in the interests of road safety. Most agricultural tractors must be fitted with a safety cab and there is simply not the room to carry a supervisor. A similar exemption applies to other single seater vehicles, unable to carry a supervisor.

Heathrow-Gatwick Helicopter Link

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has yet reached a decision on the future of the scheduled helicopter service between Heathrow and Gatwick Airports; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: I have considered very carefully the Civil Aviation Authority's decision to grant British Caledonian's application to continue the Airlink service. I have also taken careful note of the evidence submitted to the authority, the transcript of the 16-day public hearing and the considerable number of representations which I received on the authority's decision.

Because of its environmental aspects, the authority notified the decision to me under section 17 of the Civil Aviation Act 1982. I have to decide whether it would be appropriate for me to direct the CAA to revoke the licence it granted for the Airlink service in order to prevent environmental disturbance caused by the helicopter. As with my decision in 1984 on a previous Airlink application, I believe that in reaching my decision the environmental disturbance caused by the helicopter has to be weighed against the economic benefits of allowing the service to continue.

The arguments for and against the service are very finely balanced. On the one hand I must take into account the degree of disturbance caused to those under the flight path. I am conscious that some of the environmental objections to the service are exaggerated. But, even allowing for this, it remains the case that disturbance caused by the Airlink service arouses widespread and genuine annoyance and causes some distress. On the other hand British Caledonian and other airlines earn significant revenues from passengers making connections over the London airport system; and Airlink has in the past undoubtedly helped to attract such passengers to London.

I believe, however, that the helicopter service is no longer so critical for this purpose. In addition to the fast and frequent coach service which now operates, the completion of the motorway link between the two airports should also allow fast journeys by other forms of road transport. Between them these should offer transferring passengers a sufficient choice of speed, comfort, convenience and price. Moreover, in the absence of a helicopter link the airlines will no doubt concentrate on seeking to improve further the quality of the surface links between the two airports. I believe this should be possible. Although a scheduled helicopter service would expand the choice a little further, I feel that the various alternatives to the Airlink service should be acceptable to the majority of passengers wishing to transfer from Heathrow to Gatwick and vice versa. I believe, therefore, that when the availability of these alternative forms of transport is taken into account the environmental disturbance caused by the helicopter cannot now be justified.

I am therefore minded to direct the CAA to revoke British Caledonian's licence to operate the helicopter service. Before doing so, however, I am consulting the authority as required under section 6(2) of the 1982 Act. My officials are also writing to British Caledonian.

I am aware there can be no guarantee that adequate surface links will be maintained. I would therefore be prepared to look again at the need for a scheduled service, should the question come before me at some future date, if the speed, frequency or quality of the alternatives deteriorate significantly, or if a service could be operated with markedly less impact. The alternatives to the helicopter, however, would first have to be given a year or two to prove themselves.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Transport what measures his Department is taking to make more information available to hon. Members about the proposed Channel tunnel.

Mr. David Mitchell: On 4 February the Government published a White Paper "The Channel Fixed Link" (Cmnd. 9735) which explained the basis of its choice of scheme and outlined the next steps. The promoters of the chosen scheme, Eurotunnel, formerly known as CTG—France-Manche, have arranged an exhibition in the North Tower foyer of the Department's offices at 2 Marsham street; it opens today and will run until 16 May. A member of Eurotunnel's staff will be present on weekdays between 12 noon and 6.30 pm to deal with any queries. I hope that as many Members of Parliament as possible will take advantage of this opportunity to learn more about the scheme.

SCOTLAND

Home Helps

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a comparative table showing the numbers of home helps employed in each region, division or island authority in Scotland each year from 1979 to 1985.

Mr. John MacKay: The information available centrally and included in the Scottish Education Department's annual publication "Home Care Services, Day Care Establishments and Day Services" is in the form of totals for each regional and island authority. These figures are as follows:

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the method used by each regional authority for granting qualification to free school meals, and the numbers of children in these categories in each region receiving free meals as a result.

Mr. Allan Stewart: All education authorities have a statutory duty to provide free school meals for pupils whose families are in receipt of supplementary benefit or family income supplement. The following authorities are, at their discretion, also currently awarding free meals to some children on the basis of their family income—

Central
Dumfries and Galloway
Fife
Strathclyde
Orkney
Shetland
Western Isles

The criteria adopted for discretionary free meals varies from authority to authority.

Grampian and Western Isles also provide free school meals to pupils whose families are in receipt of housing benefit supplement.

Details of the number of pupils receiving free meals within each of these categories is not collected in the school meals census survey, which in January 1985 showed a total of 136,669 children receiving free school meals.

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a comparative table showing the total uptake of school meals to pupils present from 1979 to 1985 in each region, division or island authority in Scotland.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information is as follows:

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the number and names of schools in each region or division in Scotland which do not supply school meals, giving the reasons for their not supplying meals.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information taken from the 1985 annual school meals census is as follows:

I shall write to the hon. Member with the names of the schools and a summary of the reasons for not supplying meals.

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing (a) the total number of staff employed in the school meals service each year since 1979 in each region of Scotland and (b) the numbers of staff employed for (i) 30 or more hours per week and (ii) less than 30 hours per week.

Roadworks, Caithness

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the current proposed starting date for the reconstruction of the A9 at Navidale Brae, north of Helmsdale in Sutherland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: The earliest possible start to an improvement of this section of the A9 would be in late 1987, subject to satisfactory economic appraisal, completion of statutory procedures and availability of funds.

Advertising Agencies

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Scotland which advertising agencies have been engaged by his Department for each of the past five years; and what sums each have been paid.

Mr. Rifkind: The information is set out in the table:

House Condition Survey

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when the next housing condition survey will be carried out in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: No national house condition surveys have been carried out in Scotland. My right hon. and learned Friend is so far not convinced that the significant resources which would be required to produce accurate information beyond that already available should be deflected from the primary task of undertaking work on the housing stock.

Local authorities have duties to consider housing conditions and needs in their areas and powers to carry out surveys to identify the condition of the stock.

Lochaber

Sir Russell Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of persons currently unemployed in Lochaber; in which age groups they are; and what was the figure for April and October in each of the years 1980 to 1985.

Mr. Allan Stewart: Information on unemployment by age category is available in the House of Commons Library. Because of various changes in the way the statistics have been compiled, year by year comparisons over the period may mislead.

Scottish Development Agency (Renfrew)

Mr. Allen Adams asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what percentage of the Scottish Development Agency's available funds was spent in Renfrew district between January and April; if, during that period, any factors arose which caused the agency to alter its expenditure priorities in relation to Renfrew district; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Allan Stewart: In the period January to April 1986 the Scottish Development Agency spent £740,000 in Renfrew district. This represents 1·9 per cent. of the agency's total expenditure over the same period. During that period no factors arose which caused the agency to alter its expenditure priorities in Renfrew district. On 18 February 1986 Paisley and Renfrew Enterprise Trust was launched. The agency is committed to providing £63,500 over three years in support of the trust's activities.

Land Tribunal

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will make any additional or temporary appointment to the Land Tribunal for Scotland to expedite appeals under section 15(1A) to (1C) of the Local Government (Financial Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1963; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: From 1 October last year a part-time surveyor member of the Land Tribunal for Scotland became a full-time member for a period of two years. In addition two new part-time legal appointments were made also for a period of two years from 1 October 1985. All of these appointments were made primarily to deal with the anticipated work load on valuation appeals. I am not aware of any need for further appointments to the tribunal.

Sports Grounds (Rating)

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he intends to meet the Scottish Sports Association to discuss the rating of sports grounds and premises in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: I am not aware of any request from the Scottish Sports Association for a meeting on this subject. I nevertheless appreciate the strength of feeling amongst sports clubs in Scotland about rates. The fact that the present valuation and rating systems in Great Britain can lead to differences of the kind some clubs have mentioned is one of the reasons the Government are tackling the difficult task of reforming local taxation, as is shown by our Green Paper "Paying for Local Government" (Cmnd. 9714). In the shorter term, many sports clubs have appealed against their rateable values, but I cannot comment on the merits of the cases. Rating relief of up to 100 per cent. is available to non-profit-making recreational clubs; decisions on this are wholly at the discretion of the appropriate rating authority.

Teachers' Pay

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimate he has received from the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities of the anticipated extra expenditure incurred by regions in settlement of teachers' pay for 1985-86.

Mr. Ancram: The Convention of Scottish Local Authorities have estimated that education authorities have incurred £11,286,000 expenditure on teachers' pay in 1985-86 in excess of the provision they originally made in their budgets for that year, after account is taken of the savings made by the authorities because of the teachers' strike action.

Royal Scottish National Hospital

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will arrange for the report of the Medical Health Commission on the Royal Scottish national hospital at Larbert to be published.

Mr. John MacKay: My hon. Friend is presumably referring to the annual report for 1985 of the Mental Welfare Commission for Scotland dealing inter alia with its visits to various hospitals. I understand this report is now being prepared for publication.

Departmental Staff

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many people were employed in his Department in 1975 and each subsequent year;

(2) how many people were employed in the different occupational categories in his Department in 1975 and each subsequent year.

Mr. Rifkind [pursuant to his reply, 18 April 1986, c. 522]: The information is set out in the table. The figures relate to 1 April each year. Part-time staff are counted as half units and casual staff are excluded. The figures take account of the following staffing implications of machinery of government changes:—

Date
July 1975	155·0 staff from Department of Trade and Industry
April 1978	501·0 staff from Property Services Agency
April 1980	107·0 staff from Property Services Agency

Prison Officers

Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many prison officers have received injuries due to attacks by inmates at Peterhead prison in the years 1980 to 1985 and the latest figure for 1986; how many officers required hospital treatment: and how many days were lost by officers in the same period due to injuries sustained.

Mr. John MacKay [pursuant to his reply, 21 April 1986, c. 24]: the information is as follows:

Advertising Agencies

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Wales which advertising agencies have been engaged by his Department for each of the past five years; and what sums each have been paid.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The advertising agencies engaged for each of the past five years were as follows:

1982-83
Wasey Campbell Ewald Ltd	1,626

Hospital Consultants (Prescriptions)

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the health authorities and health districts in Wales which are making or have instituted arrangements to cease providing drugs and other medications from hospital dispensaries when they are prescribed by hospital consultants; and what will be the estimated savings to each district authority of the discontinuance of this service.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information is not readily available and I shall write to the hon. Gentleman as soon as I am in a position to do so.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prisoners (Visits)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of the adult prison population are estimated to receive only the minimum visiting entitlement of six and a half hours per year.

Mr. Mellor: My noble Friend will write to the hon. Member.

Prison Officers

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many male and female prison officers, respectively, were employed on the most recent convenient date.

Mr. Mellor: On 1 April 1986, 17,845 male and 1,042 female members of the prison officer class were employed in Prison Department outstations.

Neighbourhood Watch Schemes

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the evaluation by the scientific and research branch of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary on neighbourhood watch schemes is yet complete; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Home Office and Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary keep the development of neighbourhood watch under careful review. This is a continuing process.

Although there is no evaluation as specifically described by my hon. Friend, the institute of criminology, Cambridge university and the directorate of management services of the Metropolitan police are both carrying out evaluations of neighbourhood watch in London. The results are expected to become available by the end of this year.

Remission

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the minimum sentence of imprisonment which is eligible for once third remission.

Mr. Mellor: Any prison sentence which, after taking account of reckonable remand time under section 67 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967, effectively exceeds five days attracts (by virtue of rule 5 of the Prison Rules 1964) one-third remission provided that the application of the rule does not result in an actual term served of less than five days.

Offensive Weapons

Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any proposals to introduce legislation to prevent the sale of offensive weapons such as knuckle dusters, flick knives or machetes to children; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The importation, manufacture and sale of flick knives (and gravity knives) is already prohibited under the Restriction of Offensive Weapons Act 1959 and 1961. Under the Prevention of Crime Act 1953 it is an offence to possess any offensive weapon (including knuckle dusters or a machete) in a public place without lawful authority or reasonable excuse. We are not persuaded that further legislation is necessary at present. But we do believe that retailers should act responsibly in regard to the sale of potentially offensive weapons of any kind particularly to the young and the impressionable. We have recently issued guidelines to that effect to traders in martial arts equipment. We shall continue to watch the position very closely.

Advertising Agencies

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department which advertising agencies have been engaged by his Department for each of the past five years; and what sums each have been paid.

Mr. Hurd: The agencies engaged by the Home Office during the past five financial years, and the sums spent through these agencies, are as follows. The greater part of all these sums have been spent on buying advertising space and airtime and on production and a much smaller proportion on commission or fees to the agencies concerned.

Community Radio

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to announce his decision on the franchise for Rutland community radio; and what are the reasons for the failure to announce it already.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to complete his consideration of the recommendations made by the advisory panel on community radio.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Since receiving the report of the Advisory Panel on Community Radio in February we have been giving careful consideration to the applications and to the issues raised for the planning and conduct of the community radio experiment. My right hon. Friend hopes to announce his conclusions soon. The Government decided to start the experiment to test the viability and effect of new services extending the range of radio broadcasting and so broadening consumer choice. We are therefore keen to see the experiment proceed and to provide useful results. We also have a responsibility, however, before any licences are awarded, to ensure both that the experiment strikes a fair balance between the different kinds of services to be provided and is set up in such a way as to provide a fair test, with suitable safeguards, of the extent to which they meet the needs of the communities concerned, so as to provide a sound basis for the future of community radio. This has involved further discussions with the chairman of the advisory board.

We understand the natural wish of the applicants to know the outcome. Letters have therefore been sent to all applicants explaining how matters stand.

Criminal Injuries Compensation

Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is the average waiting time for applicants for criminal injury claims to be dealt with;

(2) how many outstanding criminal injury applications there are to date.

Mr. Mellor: I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) on 23 April 1986, at column 149.

Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of staff working for the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board for each year from 1979 to 1985.

Mr. Mellor: The number of staff in post at the board, on 1 April of each year from 1979 to 1985, was as follows (part-time staff being each counted as one-half):

Date	Staff in post
1 April 1979	132·5
1 April 1980	156·5
1 April 1981	155
1 April 1982	163
1 April 1983	163
1 April 1984	182
1 April 1985	189

Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures he intends to take to reduce the number of outstanding criminal injury compensation applications.

Mr. Mellor: The financial provision for the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board in 1986-87 allows for an increase in staff and in compensation. We are assessing the appropriate provision for 1987-88 and subsequent years, having in mind the continued increase in applications.

Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give the number of applications for criminal injuries compensation for each year from 1979 to 1985.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested was published in respect of the financial years 1979-80 to 1984-85 in the 18th and 21st reports of the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board (Cmnd. 8752 and Cmnd. 9684). The provisional figure of applications received by the board in 1985-86 is about 39,700.

Weapons (Police Certification)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to require potential purchasers of airguns, catapults and martial arts devices to obtain a certificate from the police prior to purchase; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: High powered air weapons are already subject to control under the Firearms Act 1968 and a firearm certificate is required for their purchase and possession. The Act also controls the sale of low powered air weapons to young people under 17 years of age. We have no plans at present to introduce further legislation concerning air weapons or to licence other potentially offensive articles such as martial arts devices and catapults. We have already issued guidelines to traders about the sale of martial arts equipment, a copy of which has been placed in the Library. We would expect traders to exercise the same degree of responsibility in respect of the sale of catapults.

Mr. & Mrs. Robert Stapleton (Documents)

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, further to his answer of 28 April, Official Report, column 301-2, if he will call for a further report from the chief constable of Lincolnshire as to what has happened to the documents seized from Mr and Mrs Stapleton and neither returned to them nor produced as evidence for the purposes of the current investigation.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand that the committal proceedings in this case are to begin on 16 June. The documents held will be required then and may be required in any subsequent proceedings. There is nothing further to add to the reply given to the hon. Member on 28 April, at columns 301-2.

British Embassy, Dublin

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the British embassy in Dublin ceased issuing entry certificates to the United Kingdom; by what authority such a decision was taken; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waddington: The changes in the immigration rules which came into effect on 26 August 1985 (HC 503) made it clear that applications for entry certificates and letters of consent must be made outside the common travel area.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Car Industry

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what information he has as to which publicly owned car manufacturers in the European Economic Community are currently making (a) losses and (b) profits; what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that cars sold by these manufacturers in the United Kingdom are not being sold below the cost of production; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: We do not have detailed information about the current financial performance of publicly owned car manufacturers in the EC.

More generally, however, in their most recently published annual results Renault, SEAT, Austin Rover, General Motors Europe and Peugeot reported losses; while Fiat, BMW, Volkswagen, Daimler-Benz, Porsche, Jaguar and Ford (UK) announced profits. (In some cases other operations in addition to cars are included; and these companies are not all publicly owned.)

We are not aware of any evidence to suggest that the cars produced by EC manufacturers are being sold in the United Kingdom below production cost.

Consumer Protection

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether Her Majesty's Government have any proposals to give greater protection to individuals paying in advance for goods and services.

Mr. Howard: I have no further such proposals in mind. The special provisions in the Insolvency Act 1985 on the potential disqualification and personal liability of directors responsible for wrongful trading, which came into force last week (28 April), will give greater protection to individuals paying in advance for goods and services. The Government consider that these provisions will achieve the necessary balance but would be prepared to re-examine the need for further action if experience of the effectiveness of these provisions indicates that this is necessary.

I also take the view that action by the trade to improve existing protective schemes and to establish new voluntary schemes, in the ways suggested by the Director General of Fair Trading in his recent report on "The Protection of Consumer Prepayments", will be an effective means of achieving greater protection.

Exchange Rate

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate Her Majesty's Government have made of the effect of exchange rate stability on exporters and on importers; what proportion of United Kingdom imports and exports of manufactured goods are traded with European Monetary System countries; and what is the balance of trade in manufactures with such countries.

Mr. Butcher: None, although a number of studies by outside bodies have examined the impact of exchange rate variability on trade flows. In 1985 the countries of the European monetary system accounted for 39 per cent. of our exports and 52 per cent. of our imports of manufactures. The balance of trade in manufactures with these countries showed a deficit of £8 billion.

Manufactures

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the volume and value of imports of finished manufactures each year since 1970 and this year to date on the basis of current weights; and if he will provide the same figure for exports.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is as follows:

Finished manufactures
OTS basis
Volume Index (current weighted, 1980 = 100)

	Imports £ million	Exports £ million	Imports	Exports
1970	2,091	4,050	36·4	71·0

*1986	9,247	7,963	142·4	102·6

* First quarter, seasonally adjusted.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in which quarters since 1970 the terms of trade for finished manufactures have been higher than in the three months ended February 1986.

Mr. Butcher: The terms of trade index for finished manufactures in the three months ending February 1986 was 102·7 (1980 = 100). The index was higher in the first quarter of 1981 (103·2) and the fourth quarter of 1985 (103·3).

Trade Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each year since 1970 the United Kingdom relative export prices shown in table F3 of the "Monthly Review of External Trade Statistics" using current trade weights: and if he will give his estimate for the most recent quarter.

Mr. Alan Clark: Data in respect of 1985 are still incomplete. The figures based on 1984 weights are in the table:

*United Kingdom Relative Export Prices

Year
1970	79·3
1971	80·8
1972	80·9
1973	74·7

* The United Kingdom Export Unit Value index for manufactures divided by the weighted average of the unit value indices of competitors' exports of manufactures, both expressed in a common currency 1984 weights have been used.

BL (Corporate Plan)

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the current position on BL's corporate plan.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Following his appointment as chairman on 1 May, the Government will be reviewing with Mr. Graham Day the development of corporate plans for BL's businesses.

Multi-fibre Arrangement

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received on the multi-fibre arrangement; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: Recently I have received representations from a number of hon. Members and others concerned with the interests of the United Kingdom textiles and clothing industries; of those in Hong Kong; and of the developing countries.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has made a further assessment since the Silberston report of the effect on (a) jobs and (b) profitability of an abandonment of the multi-fibre arrangement.

Mr. Alan Clark: No further study of the economic effects of the multi-fibre arrangement has been commissioned by the Government since the report prepared by Professor Silberston, but others have studied the effects of the MFA on particular interests and on the economy as a whole. I consider all views with interest.

Advertising Agencies

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which advertising agencies have been engaged by his Department for each of the past five years; and what sums each have been paid.

Mr. Butcher: The advertising agencies employed on Department of Trade and Industry campaigns over the last five years, and the sums paid to them, are as follows:

Indo-Rail Exhibition (Jakarta)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on which date his Department received notice from the organisers of the Indo-Rail Exhibition in Jakarta held on 16 to 19 April last; what action was taken; and for what reasons no support was offered to participants from the United Kingdom.

Mr. Alan Clark: The organisers of the Indo-Rail exhibition notified my Department of the event in a letter to the British Overseas Trade Board dated 2 December.

Our Embassy in Jakarta, with whom the organisers were in contact, were informed on 5 December that because BOTB resources for support of exporters at overseas trade fairs in 1986-87 were already fullly allocated and a substantial reserve list existed, it was unlikely that it would be possible to provide support for a United Kingdom group at Indo-Rail, should the trade association concerned (Railways Industries Association) make an application. This position was confirmed when a representative of the organisers attended a meeting at the BOTB on 8 January.

Mergers

Mr. Madel asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the average length of time taken by the Office of Fair Trading before deciding whether to advise him to refer a proposed merger to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Mr. Howard: The Director General of Fair Trading would normally expect to advise my right hon. Friend within three to four weeks of his Office being given all the necessary information. The length of time may vary however, depending on the urgency or complexity of the case. In the case of public offers for shares the Director General normally aims to advise my right hon. Friend in time for a decision to be announced on or before the first closing date for the offer.

Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce legislation to require bidders to display the commercial logic and benefit to consumers and employees of mergers and takeover bids under consideration by the Office of Fair Trading.

Mr. Howard: Such considerations as the motivation and plans of the companies, and the effects on consumers and employment, are among the factors taken into account under current procedures. In assessing whether a merger or merger proposal raises public interest issues which deserve further investigation by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, the Director General of Fair Trading considers all aspects of the merger. In deciding whether to refer a merger or merger proposal to the MMC, in the light of the advice of the Director General, my right hon. Friend also takes into account all the relevant circumstances.

Export Credit

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, further to his answer of 25 April, Official Report, column 252, if he will publish the correspondence with the European Economic Commission concerning United Kingdom practice on interest rates for export credit.

Mr. Alan Clark: There has been no written correspondence recently with the European Commission on this matter.

Ultraleisure

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, further to his answer of 25 April, Official Report, column 253, what information was available to Export Credits Guarantee Department officials as to the final destination of the Ultraleisure export contracts referred to; and what advice on the formation of Ultraleisure's Swiss subsidiary was offered by his officials.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Ultraleisure contracts referred to are currently the subject of police investigations. In these circumstances it would not be appropriate for me to give the information requested.

European Regional Development Fund

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry under which European Economic Community regulation or directive the figure of 35 per cent. for population within the United Kingdom that may obtain European regional development fund funding was laid down; if this percentage is still in force; and if he will make a statement on its application to the county of Devon.

Mr. Butcher: The main regulation governing the European regional development fund (1787/84) provides that the regions or areas where fund assistance may be given to projects or to national programmes of Community interest are limited to those aided areas established by member states in applying their systems of regional aids. No European Community instrument lays down a specific limit for the percentage of the United Kingdom population that may obtain this assistance. Proposals to grant regional industrial aid need to be accepted by the European Commission under articles 92-4 of the Treaty of Rome. The United Kingdom Government reviewed the map of assisted areas in Great Britain in 1984. The Government then had reason to believe that a proposal to make the map cover more than 35 per cent. of the working population would probably lead to difficulties with the Commission. The Government took this into account when reaching their decisions on the map. These decisions were notified to the Commission, which raised no objection. As a consequence of the Government's decision in 1984 the areas in Devon which are eligible for this aid from the fund are those parts of the county which are within the travel-to-work areas of Plymouth and Bude.

South Africa

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will now reverse the 1979 decision not to name the companies covered under the European Economic Community code of conduct for companies operating in South Africa; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: All companies known or believed to have interests covered by the reporting requirements of the European Community code of conduct have been listed in the annexes to the Department's annual analysis and summary of company reports since the code's adoption.

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many erratum notes were dispatched from his Department in respect of his Department's code of conduct for companies with interests in South Africa, analysis and summary of companies report 1 July 1984 to 30 June 1985; if he is satisfied that efforts have been made to ensure that all recipients of the original report have received a copy of the erratum note; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Department has distributed some 300 copies of an erratum note, sufficient to ensure that all recorded recipients of the original report are advised of the correction.

Shipbuilding (Aid)

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will provide a table on the same basis as the answer of 8 November 1982, Official Report, column 71, showing the aid to shipbuilding and shipowners in EEC countries, Japan, South Korea and Brazil.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The following is the current information on merchant shipbuilding support:

Direct Aid to Shipbuilding	Home Credit Scheme Aid to Shipowners
United Kingdom
Up to 22½ per cent. of contract price (includes 2 per cent. Shipbuilders Relief)	80 per cent. over eight and a half years at 7½ per cent. (on orders placed in United Kingdom yards only)
Belgium

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much money has been paid out in shipbuilding intervention fund assistance in each year since the fund was established.

Mr. Butcher: Payments made from the shipbuilding intervention fund during each financial year since its inception are as follows:

Financial Year	£ million
1976-77	1·4
1977-78	19·3
1978-79	10·8
1979-80	31·9
1980-81	41·9
1981-82	49·1
1982-83	47·9
1983-84	36·2
1984-85	20·1
1985-86	25·9

It should be noted that actual expenditure from the intervention fund is geared to the contractual payment stages during the course of construction figures for offers of assistance are published in the annual report on the Industrial Development Act 1982.

Intervention Fund

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will place in the Library Her Majesty's Government's submission for the new negotiations on intervention fund support.

Mr. Butcher: Discussions between the European Commission and Member States on the successor to the fifth Directive on Shipbuilding Aids are at a preliminary stage. The matter is next to be discussed at the Council of Industry Ministers on 9 June; but the Commission has yet to make proposals on the basis of which negotiations can begin. It is not of the nature of these negotiations for member states to make formal submissions to the Commission; but I can assure the hon. Member that we shall seek an aid regime with the interests of United Kingdom shipbuilders fully in mind.

United States Export Regulations

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he had with the United States authorities on his recent visit to the United States of America about (a) the attempted enforcement of United States export regulations in the United Kingdom, (b) the case of Systime plc, (c) the restraints on EEC internal trade implicit in the United States distribution licence arrangements and (d) the question of a secure supply of software and maintenance for existing United Kingdom users of computers of United States origin; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: During my visit, I made clear to the United States Secretary of Commerce our continuing strong objections to extraterritorial United States re-export controls. I referred similarly to the extraterritorial aspects of the new distribution licence regulations. The United States authorities are well aware of our views on Systime's alleged violations of United States re-export controls, and on the cutting off of United States supplies to United Kingdom firms who refuse to give re-export undertakings.

British Shipbuilders

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list all new orders won by each yard in British Shipbuilders, by month, since January 1985 and the contract delivery dates.

Mr. Butcher: The following is the information:

Month of order	BS yard	Vessel	Contract delivery dates
January 1985	Ailsa	2×oilrig supply vessels	March 1986
			April 1986
February 1985	A & P	2×cargo vessels	September 1986
			December 1986
	Ailsa	1× Fishery research vessel	September 1986
	Goven	1×passenger RO/RO Ferry	March 1987
			February 1986
			June 1986
			September 1986
	Smiths Dock	4×3D King 15 cargo vessels	December 1986
March 1985	Sunderland	1×Crane Ship	March 1987
April 1985	A & P	1× N/P Pontoon Barge	September 1985
	A & P	1×N/P Pontoon Barge	November 1985

Month of order	BS yard	Vessel	Contract delivery dates
May 1985	Appledore	1×Trailing Suction Hoppoer Dredger	September 1986
September 1985	Appledore	1×Trailing Suction Hopper Dredger	July 1987
February 1986	A & P	1×N/P Barge	December 1986

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which public sector orders, to be awarded in 1986, and for which British Shipbuilders is able to tender, have been notified to his Department.

Mr. Butcher: I am aware of the following orders that are likely to be placed in 1986:

—A fisheries protection vessel for the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries Scotland of some 3,380 cgt.

—A passenger/vehicle ferry for Caledonian MacBrayne of some 5,500 cgt.

—An inter-island passenger/vehicle ferry for the Orkney Islands Council of some 500 cgt.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what arrangements he proposes for redundancy payments after 31 December for employees of British Shipbuilders.

Mr. Butcher: The statutory shipbuilding redundancy payments scheme was extended to 31 December 1986 by the Shipbuilding Act 1985. The Government consider that a further extension is inappropriate because there should be parity between public and private sectors by having no statutory scheme for either. British Shipbuilders and Harland and Wolff are examining the format of successor schemes. Schemes for private sector yards are for negotiation between managements and their work force.

United Kingdom-United States Trade Relations

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in view of the decision of the governor of Washington State to cancel a trade mission to the United Kingdom because of the alleged risks to visitors to Britain from terrorism, whether he is taking any steps to safeguard and promote United Kingdom/United States trade relations.

Mr. Alan Clark: My Department actively promotes British trade with the United States, and will continue to do so despite the regrettable concellation of this visit.

Strategic Defence Initiative

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the effect on British trade with the Eastern bloc of United Kingdom involvement in the strategic defence initiative research programme, and in particular, of American concern to limit the transfer of technology.

Mr. Butcher [pursuant to his reply, 1 May 1986, c. 453]: I am not aware of any effect on British trade with the Eastern bloc as a result of the United Kingdom's involvement in the strategic defence initiative. My Department will continue to keep the position under review.

Toys

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he is satisfied with the current definition of toy in the Toy (Safety) Regulations 1974; if he will extend it to include any article which because of its size or appearance could be mistaken for a child's plaything; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: [pursuant to his reply, 2 May 1986, c. 526.]: The current definition is generally satisfactory. But I am aware that some goods, which would not meet the requirements of the Toys (Safety) Regulations 1974 because of sharp spikes or edges, excessive lead in paint or other reasons, are being supplied as novelties, collectors' items, figurines, executive toys, decorations or similar descriptions and that they are technically legal although likely to be played with by children. One of the benefits of the general safety requirement for consumer goods proposed in our White Paper (Cmnd. 9302) is that it will do much to close this loophole.

The definition of toy may be amended once the EC proposal for a toy safety directive is adopted by member states. This amendment may be a marginal improvement. I am considering the extent to which a definition along the lines of that proposed, would make a contribution to reducing the dangers to which children may be exposed.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

British Citizens Abroad (Hostages)

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many British citizens are currently held hotage abroad (a) by Governments and (b) by others; in which countries they are held; and what representations have been made in these cases by Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Eggar: Two Britons, Mr. Alec Collett and Mr. John McCarthy have been abducted by terrorist groups in the Lebanon. Their precise whereabouts are unknown. Representations on their behalf have been made to several Governments in the Middle East and to other groups and organisations which may be in a position to help.

Hong Kong (GATT)

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the recognition of Hong Kong as a general agreement on tariffs and trade contracting party has been accepted by all general agreement on tariffs and trade members.

Mr. Renton: Following declarations to the GATT secretariat by the United Kingdom and the People's Republic of China on 23 April, the secretariat informed contracting parties that Hong Kong had become a contracting party as from that date. The procedure did not require the approval of other GATT members.

Hong Kong

Sir Paul Bryan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied with the state of further education in Hong Kong; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: The Hong Kong Government continue to make satisfactory progress in providing further education to meet the territory's professional manpower needs and Hong Kong students' aspirations. The recent decisions of the Hong Kong Government to establish a third university, and to increase the numbers of the places available in the existing universities and other institutes of higher education, will ensure that the long-term targets for further education continue to be met.

North Atlantic Assembly

Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list in the Official Report the United Kingdom parliamentary delegation to the North Atlantic Assembly.

Mr. Eggar: The following represent the United Kingdom at the North Atlantic Assembly:

Sir Patrick Wall MP (Leader)
Mr. Robert Banks MP
Sir Peter Emery MP
Sir Philip Goodhart MP
Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith MP
Mr. Robert McCrindle MP
Sir Julian Ridsdale MP
Mr. Peter Viggers MP
Mr. Jerry Wiggin MP
Earl of Kimberley
Earl de la Warr
Dr. David Clark MP
Mr. Patrick Duffy MP
Mr. Bruce George MP
Mr. Kevin McNamara MP
Lord Ardwick
The right honourable Lord Mayhew
Mr. John Cartwright MP

My hon. Friend the Member for Winchester (Mr. Browne) is an alternate member of the delegation.

EMPLOYMENT

Advertising Agencies

Mr. Clay asked the Paymaster General which advertising agencies have been engaged by his Department for each of the past five years; and what sums each has been paid.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: In this period, four agencies have handled campaigns by my Department. These were Freeman Mathews and Treasure (previously Freeman Mathews and Milne), Charles Barker and Sons Ltd., Davidson Pearce Ltd. and Industrial Publicity Service Ltd.

The sums which have been paid to these agencies are:

1981-82
Freeman Mathews and Milne	357,533
Charles Barker	9,445
1982-83
Freeman Mathews and Milne	476,065
Charles Barker	4,496
1983-84
Freeman Mathews and Treasure	17,522
Charles Barker	1,395
Davidson Pearce	459,966
1984-85
Davidson Pearce	7,346
1985-86
Davidson Pearce	82,300
Industrial Publicity Service	110,179

This exludes some details of minor expenditure on miscellaneous advertising, such as local recruitment, which would be available only at disproportionate cost.

Advertising Agencies

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which advertising agencies have been engaged by his Department for each of the past five years; and what sums each has been paid.

Mr. Eggar: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office has engaged the following advertising agencies during the past five years:

Financial Years

	1981-82 £	1982-83 £	1983-84 £	1984-85 £	1985-86 £

Central Regional Council

Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Paymaster General what action has been taken to ensure that the Central regional council submits accurate returns for the census of employment in future; if he will estimate the effect of previous inaccurate returns on the published unemployment figures for the Stirling constituency; and if he will indicate the extent to which this affected the Stirling constituency's eligibility for regional assistance.

Mr. Lang: Arrangements have been made to allocate the employees of Central regional council to their correct districts for the 1984 census of employment. My officials have also arranged for the council to be given advance warning of the need to provide sufficiently detailed information to allow employees to be correctly classified in the forthcoming 1986 census.

If allowances are made for the inaccuracies in the 1981 census, resulting from the Central regional council's return, the unemployment rate for Stirling travel-to-work area is estimated at 14·4 per cent. for March 1986. The current published figure is 11·9 per cent. Unemployment rates were only one of several factors taken into consideration in deciding assisted area status. I am advised by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry that the errors made were insufficient to have altered the decision that Stirling travel-to-work area should not be included in the assisted area map.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Donald Stewart asked the Paymaster General if, pursuant to the answer of 28 April to the right hon. Member for the Western Isles, Official Report, column 338, he will give percentage unemployed figures for each area concerned.

Mr. Lang: The available percentage rates are given in the reply in column 338. The percentage unemployment rates (at 6 March 1986) for the areas in the answer in column 339 are:

	Percentage
England	13·1
Scotland	15·9
Wales	17·3
Northern Ireland	21·4

This information is available in the Library.

Prison Officers (Earnings)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Paymaster General if, pursuant to the reply of 30 April to the hon. Member for Leicester, East, Official Report, column 423, he will publish in the Official Report such information as is available to him about prison officers' salaries and overtime earnings in respect of the period since the data were collected for the new earnings survey report for 1985; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: In July 1985 the April 1985 pay settlement of 4·98 per cent. for prison officers was implemented. This settlement was not included in the 1985 new earnings survey results.

Keyboard Ltd.

Mr. David Marshall asked the Paymaster General how many representations he has received about the adequacy of the training given under the YTS to young people by the firm Keyboard Ltd., also known as Keyscot; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: I have received no representations about the adequacy of the training provided by Keyboard Ltd. in Scotland. However, on 11 April 1986 the Manpower Services Commission gave Keyboard Productivity (Scotland) Ltd. one month's notice of termination of its YTS contract and closure of its scheme, on the ground of its inability to continue to deliver training of the required quality.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Visitors

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the number of visitors to Northern Ireland in 1985 who stayed overnight; and what was the highest number of such visitors in a calendar year between 1956 and 1969.

Dr. Boyson: The Northern Ireland tourist board's preliminary estimate of staying visitors in 1985 is 863,000. The highest number of tourists was 1,139,000 recorded in 1968.

Hotels

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland during the past 10 years (a) how many new hotels in Northern Ireland were opened, (b) how many new beds they provided, (c) how many hotels were closed and (d) how many beds were lost in the same period.

Dr. Boyson: The information required is as follows:

1976-1985	Number	Rooms
New hotels opened	17	362
Hotels closed	29	991

EC Regional Development Fund

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total amount received in Northern Ireland from the first programme of the non-quota section of the European Community regional development fund by (a) shipbuilding districts and (b) border districts.

Dr. Boyson: Under the first shipbuilding measure, some £1·7 million was made available to Northern Ireland, of which £1·1 million has been received to date.

The first border areas measure made available some £4·5 million of which £2·8 million has so far been received.

Final claims under both measures, which expired at the end of 1985, will be submitted to the Commission during the current year.

Advertising Agencies

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which advertising agencies have been engaged by his Department for each of the past five years; and what sums each has been paid.

Mr. Scott: The total amount paid by the Northern Ireland Office and the Northern Ireland Departments are as follows:

1981-82	1,314,000
1982-83	1,118,000
1983-84	2,479,000
1984-85	1,800,000
1985-86	2,380,000

I shall be writing to the hon. Member shortly with the further details requested.

Terrorism

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland why there is a divergence in the figures given by Her Majesty's Government and those given by the Royal Ulster Constabulary in 1985 for explosions and for firearms and weapons incidents.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Intimidation

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) following acts of intimidation against the security forces since 1 March (a) how many people have been arrested, (b) how many people have been charged and (c) what the charges were; and if there have been any resulting convictions;

(2) how many acts of intimidation were carried out against members of the security forces by (a) Loyalist groups, and (b) non-Loyalist groups since 1 March;

(3) if he will publish a table in the Official Report showing how many acts of intimidation have been reported against members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, the Royal Ulster Constabulary Reserve full-time and the Royal Ulster Constabulary Reserve part-time, while they were off duty, detailing specifically (a) whether these acts involved petrol bombs, stonings, shootings, (b) when property was damaged and to what extent, (c) when people were injured, and how severe those injuries were, (d) where the incidents took place and (e) whether they were during the day or the night, since 1 March.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Security Forces (Re-housing)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many members of the security forces have (a) requested to be re-housed following acts of intimidation, and (b) been re-housed since 1 March; and on what basis any requests have been turned down.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Royal Ulster Constabulary

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to the reply of 1 May to the hon. Member for Leicester, East, how many members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary have applied to transfer to other police forces in Great Britain in each of the past three years and in 1986 to date; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison) on 17 April 1986, at column 470.

NORAID

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he or Ministers in his Department have on visits to the United States of America made representations to the United States Government to take legal or legislative steps against the NORAID organisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tom King [pursuant to his reply, 24 April 1986, c. 202]: Representations have been made on many occasions about support from United States citizens to terrorists in Northern Ireland. The United States Government have made clear their opposition to groups who give support to terrorists, and in particular have taken vigorous action against those who supply weapons. I am grateful for their co-operation.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Further Education

2. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to increase the advanced further education pool for 1987-88; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will determine the advanced further education pool for 1987-88 in the context of the Government's plans for local authority spending in 1987-88 which will be announced later in the year.

General Certificate of Secondary Education

12. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress his Department has made in discussions with the teacher unions relating to the viability of his timetable for the introduction of the general certificate of secondary education examination.

Mr. Chris Patten: My right hon. Friend has expressed to all the teachers' associations his willingness to receive any further and detailed comments they may have about the preparation for and funding of the introduction of the GCSE. The Department stands ready to consider these matters further.

26. Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a further statement on progress with the implementation of the general certificate of seconday education examination.

Mr. Chris Patten: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin).

34. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many representations he has received asking for the new general certificate of secondary education examination to be delayed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: Since the beginning of the year, the Department has received some 1,200 letters from various bodies and individuals requesting that the GCSE be delayed. The measures announced by my right hon. Friend on 13 March are designed to ensure the successful completion of the training programme and to allow authorities to fund a real increase in books and equipment for the GCSE and thus meet the real concerns expressed by those who have made representations.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received concerning his decision to continue with the implementation of the new general certificate of secondary education examination.

Mr. Chris Patten: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery).

Mr. Madel asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the total amount of extra expenditure so far incurred in preparation for the general certificate of secondary education examination; and what is his estimate of the amount of extra expenditure which will be required for this examination in the next three years.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Department is making a substantial contribution towards the cost of the special programme of in-service training for the introduction of the GCSE: it is supporting £8 million expenditure on supplying cover for teachers attending training seminars; and has given over £1 million to the Secondary Examinations Council and GCSE examining groups towards the cost of providing introductory training. The Government will also be giving £600,000 to the GCSE examining groups to assist with the provision of further syllabus-specific training from September onwards.

It is genuinely difficult for the Department or the local education authorities to quantify the costs of introducing GCSE. In response to representations by local education authorities and many others for more help with resources, my right hon. Friend has proposed supporting £20 million of expenditure by education support grant to help secondary schools purchase necessary additional books and equipment. This amount is in addition to the resources which local authorities may otherwise allocate for the GCSE. The Government's expenditure plans for 1986-87 provide scope for authorities to redeploy their resources towards policies to which they wish to give priority, such as the GCSE. When considering the level of local authority expenditure on education in 1987-88, the Government will take account of the representations of the local authority associations and teachers' associations on the resource implications of GCSE.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the latest progress of his discussions with teachers' unions about the general certificate of secondary education examination.

Mr. Chris Patten: My right hon. Friend met representatives of the National Union of Teachers on 16 April to discuss the planning and preparations for the introduction of the GCSE. He will be having discussions with representatives of the National Association of Head Teachers today on the same topic and expects to have further discussions with the NUT later this month. My right hon. Friend and I have said that we stand ready to discuss these important issues with any or all of the teachers' associations. We hope that all concerned will work together to ensure that the introduction of the GCSE this autumn is the success that it deserves to be.

Universities (Freedom of Speech)

18. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals to discuss the protection of freedom of speech in universities.

Mr. Walden: My right hon. Friend held a meeting on 17 February with representatives of the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals during which they had a useful exchange of views on the subject of freedom of speech and the guidance issued by the committee last December. The Government have welcomed the chairman's subsequent letter reaffirming that the guidance is intended to convey that meetings should be cancelled by institutions only in the most exceptional circumstances and normally after consultation with the police.

Aberdeen University

19. Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received about additional support for students studying at Aberdeen university.

Mr. Walden: A small number of letters have been received seeking additional support for Aberdeen students.

School Buildings

20. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects the survey of schools building improvement needs to be completed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: Local education authorities were asked to return completed forms for the schools in the survey to the Department by 1 April. Those forms which have been received are being processed. However, as the majority of forms have not yet been returned, it is not possible to say when the survey will be completed.

27. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received on the state of buildings in schools.

43. Mr. Garrett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received on the state of buildings in schools.

Mr. Dunn: The state of school buildings was discussed at the February meeting of NEDC, which my right hon. Friend attended. Representations have also been made recently to my right hon. Friend and me by hon. Members and others.

Teachers' Dispute

22. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will invite Her Majesty's Inspectorate to carry out an assessment of the effect upon schools and children of the continuing teachers' dispute.

Sir Keith Joseph: Her Majesty's inspectors' concern in their routine and specialist visits to schools is to observe and, in the case of full inspections, to report on the quality of education provided and the standards achieved by the pupils. In the past year, some schools inspected by Her Majesty's Inspectors' will have been affected by the teachers' dispute. Where the action taken appeared to be impinging upon quality and standards in the school, this will be commented upon in the published Her Majesty's Inspectorates' report.

24. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the continuing industrial action being taken by the teachers.

36. Mr. Haselhurst asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what reports he has received about the level of continuing disruption in schools, as a result of industrial action by teachers; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: I very much regret that disruption — itself, in my view, wrong and unprofessional — continues in schools in England and Wales despite the recent 8·5 per cent. pay increase and the talks now taking place under the independent panel appointed by ACAS. In the circumstances all teachers should certainly now be working normally. For its part, the NUT should reverse its policy of causing disruption, abide by the ACAS agreement of January, and join in the ACAS-assisted talks. I continue to receive information from Her Majesty's inspectors and others about disruption and its effects. Examples of continuing disruption include refusal to cover for absent colleagues; refusal to attend staff meetings or meetings with parents; and refusal to take part in curriculum development.

35. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the progress of the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service discussions on teachers' pay and conditions.

Sir Keith Joseph: I refer the hon. Member to the answer which I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway).

Education (Politicisation)

23. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has received any further representations about his draft circular on politics in schools.

Sir Keith Joseph: Thirty-five letters have been received in response to the draft circular and statement of principles issued on 4 February. Substantive replies are still awaited from seven of the organisations directly consulted.

56. Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many complaints he has received in the last 12 months about the improper political use of schools; how many such complaints have had sufficient detail to be investigated; and whether he is prepared to investigate such complaints confidentially.

Mr. Chris Patten: In the last 12 months about 70 letters expressing concern about the treatment of politically controversial issues have been received in the Department. Of these, 12 contained sufficient detail for further inquiries to have been made. My right hon. Friend is certainly willing to have complaints investigated if they contain specific details of the incidents concerned, including the name of the school, the date and as much other information as possible; if requested, the name of the person complaining will certainly be kept confidential.

Higher Education

25. Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what discussions he has had in the last month with the National Advisory Body and the University Grants Committee about the future development of higher education.

31. Mr. Stan Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what discussions he has had in the last month with the National Advisory Body and the University Grants Committee about the future of higher education.

40. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent discussions he has had with the National Advisory Body for Public Sector Higher Education and the University Grants Committee about student numbers.

42. Mr. McWilliam asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what discussions he has had in the last month with the National Advisory Body and the University Grants Committee about the future development of higher education.

Mr. Walden: I refer the hon. Members to the answer given earlier today to the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett).

30. Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects final proposals from the National Advisory Body for Public Sector Higher Education for the academic year 1987-88.

Mr. Walden: Assuming the National Advisory Body for public sector higher education (NAB) adheres to its timetable of previous years, in early December. NAB's advice to my right hon. Friend about the disposition of target student numbers and the allocation of the advanced further education pool and the voluntary colleges' quantum is for the forthcoming financial year; thus NAB's recommendations for 1987-88 will cover the first two terms of the 1987-88 academic year.

37. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to give a decision on the proposals by Manchester City education authority in relation to tertiary education provision.

Mr. Dunn: These were approved on 22 April 1986.

41. Mr. Foulkes asked asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representation he has had in the last month from higher education unions about the future of higher education.

50. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has had in the last month from higher education unions about the future of higher education.

51. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has had in the last month from higher education unions about the future of higher education.

53. Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has had in the last month from higher education unions about the future of higher education.

Mr. Walden: My right hon. Friend and I met representatives of the Association of University Teachers on 9 April; we discussed the pay of academic staff and university funding. On 29 April I met representatives of the Association of Scientific, Technical and Managerial Staff and discussed a variety of issues affecting their members employed in higher education institutions. Representatives of the Association of Principals of Colleges met me on 23 April, with others, to discuss the Green Paper "The Development of Higher Education into the 1990s."

Schools (Midday Supervision)

28. Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of pupils live in areas where the local education authority has not yet applied for Government assistance with lunchtime supervision.

Mr. Dunn: Seven per cent. of full-time pupils in maintained primary, secondary and special schools in England are registered at the schools of authorities which have not yet applied, in respect of either 1985-86 or 1986-87, for education support grant payable for or in connection with the purpose of securing the supervision of pupils in schools at midday.

Nursery Education

29. Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received on the availability of nursery education.

32. Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received on the availability of nursery education.

Mr. Dunn: I refer the hon. Members to the reply I gave earlier today to the hon. Members for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) and for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes).

Schools (Vandalism and Theft)

33. Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the annual cost of vandalism to, and theft from, schools.

Mr. Chris Patten: Information about the cost of vandalism and theft in schools is not collected centrally. I accept that the problem is a serious one, and the Department has commissioned a one-year research study to assess the extent and cost of vandalism and to suggest cost-effective and practical solutions.

Teachers (Initial Training)

38. Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of initial teacher training courses has been monitored by the Council for the Assessment of Teachers' Education.

Mr. Walden: The Secretaries of State have asked the Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education to review all existing approved courses of initial teacher training and to scrutinise any proposals for new courses for which an allocation of intake places has been made. Such courses are currently provided at 96 institutions in England, Wales and Northern Ireland. So far the council has considered the courses at 28—approximately one third—of these institutions.

School Books

39. Mr. James Lamond asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from the Educational Publishers Association on the provision of books in schools.

49. Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from the Educational Publishers Association on the provision of books in schools.

54. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from the Educational Publishers Association on the provision of books in schools.

Mr. Chris Patten: I refer the hon. Members to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Members for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) and for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron).

48. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will set out for primary and secondary schools the average expenditure on books and equipment per pupil for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Dunn: The information is as follows:

Expenditure on books and equipment per pupil—England

Teacher Training

44. Mr. Harris asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the estimated cost to local education authorities of in-service teacher training.

Mr. Chris Patten: £24 million of LEA expenditure is eligible this financial year for support from the specific grant scheme for in-service training for certain national priority purposes; the grant rate is 90 per cent. and the balance falls to the individual authority. Local education authorities may also pool certain costs of in-service training; the total expenditure eligible for pooling support is estimated at £80 million to £85 million in this financial year. The proportion of expenditure which may be pooled is 75 or 100 per cent. depending on category: the balance falls to the individual training authority. LEA expenditure under the TVEI-related in-service training scheme (TRIST) is met in full by the Manpower Services Commission; there is no residual cost to the authority. The Department does not collect information about the cost to LEAs of in-service training activities not supported by these arrangements.

Her Majesty's Inspector of Schools (Report)

45. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he expects to receive the report of Her Majesty's Inspector of Schools for 1985.

Sir Keith Joseph: I hope to receive the next report by Her Majesty's inspectors on the effects of local authority expenditure policies on education provision in England in time for it to be published towards the end of May.

Universities (Freedom of Speech)

46. Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what consultations he has had with the Committee of Directors of Polytechnics on their proposals for the protection of free speech and freedom of assembly.

Mr. Walden: My right hon. Friend has received a copy of the code of practice on freedom of speech and lawful assembly which the Committee of Directors of Polytechnics published at the end of last week. He has not yet had time to consider whether the code raises points that he would wish to discuss with the committee.

School Closures

47. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what factors he takes into account when considering applications for school closures.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend considers all school proposals on their merits, taking into account all relevant educational, social and financial factors, including statutory objections made by local government electors.

Mathematics, Engineering and Science

52. Mr. Beaumont-Dark asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many teachers have been trained in each of the last 10 years in mathematics, engineering and science.

Mr. Walden: It is not possible to give the number of teachers trained in engineering as this subject specialism is not identified for students from further education teacher training centres. Available information for successful student teachers trained for the secondary phase is as follows:

Year	Subject specialism		England and Wales

60. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many students are currently engaged in engineering, mathematics and science-related courses of study; what were the corresponding numbers in 1978-79; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Walden: The information is given in the following table. The Government's policy is to encourage a continuing shift in emphasis towards higher education courses in these subjects.

Great Britain: Higher education student numbers

School Meals

55. Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received about the nutritional value of school meals.

Mr. Dunn: None.

Animal Diseases (Research)

57. Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether the report on "Animal Diseases Research" by Professor Biggs, as described in the press statement by the Agriculture and Food Research Council, September 1985, has yet been received; whether it will be published; and what conclusions were drawn by Professor Biggs regarding the future of Houghton Poultry Research Station.

Mr. Walden: Professor Biggs' report was received by the Agricultural and Food Research Council in January 1986. I understand that it is not the council's intention to publish the report, but that it will be used by the council in determining future policy for animals disease research. The report reviews options for the organisation of this research, but contains no specific conclusions or recommendations on the long term future of the Houghton poultry research station.

Expenditure and Examination Results

58. Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he makes any assessment of the correlation between expenditure per pupil in schools and examination results; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: Statistical Bulletin 13/84 "School Standards and Spending: statistical analysis" presented an analysis of the statistical associations between the examination attainments of maintained school leavers in a local education authority, and measures of socio-economic background and broad-based school and resource variables.

The analysis showed that certain measures of socio-economic background were highly associated statistically with examination achievements, and there were much smaller, but statistically significant, correlations with other explanatory variables including measures of teaching and non-teaching expenditure per pupil. In three of the six attainment measures tested, teaching expenditure was found to be positively associated with achievement and in two of these cases non-teaching expenditure was found to be negatively correlated. In one instance, the proportion of school leavers gaining no graded O-level or CSE results, non-teaching expenditure was found to have a positive statistical association.

The only work which the Department has undertaken at the level of the individual school took account of resources in terms of pupil-teacher ratios, expenditure figures in respect of schools not being available. For only one of the examination measures did the pupil-teacher ratio appear to have a significant relationship. In this case, a small positive relationship with examination results was observed.

Civil Engineering

59. Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he is satisfied with the level of provision in higher education for the teaching of civil engineering.

Mr. Walden: Yes. The Government have no evidence that the current provision of places for civil engineering in higher education is inadequate to meet demand.

Advanced Further Education

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the total of all individual local authority bids for capital expenditure on public sector advanced further education, broken down into committed and planned expenditure, and within these two categories, into major and minor works, purchase of items costing over £100,000, other teaching and research equipment, divided into computer systems and other expenditure, furniture/plant/machine/vehicle, unrelated to new building work, land acquisition, design fees for projects starting in 1986-87 or later, and any other committed or planned expenditure, for the years 1986-87, 1987-88 and 1988-89, and the total allocations notified by his Department to the individual local education authorities, under the categories specified above for 1986-87, and the inclusive, non-binding allocations for 1987-88 and 1988-89.

Mr. Walden: The information available is as follows. Tables 1, 2 and 3 show local authority bids for 1986-87, 1987-88, and 1988-89, respectively. Table 4 shows allocations for 1986-87 and table 5 provisional, non-binding indications of committed expenditure for 1987-88 and 1988-89. The form in which the bids, allocations and provisional indication were presented does not permit further breakdown beyond that shown. The breakdown of the allocations is intended to be informative rather than prescriptive. Authorities are free under the terms of part VIII of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 to apply their allocations as they see fit, taking account of local needs as they perceive them.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science under what criteria the distribution within expenditure categories of allocations to all individual local authorities was made in respect of capital expenditure for advanced further education for 1986-87; and what criteria were used in the indicative, non-binding, allocations for 1987-88 and 1988-89.

Mr. Walden: In 1986-87 the distribution of capital for advanced further education in the local authority sector was made on the following basis:

Major Buildings: Only projects which had already received provisional approval in one of the Department's AFE major building programmes received capital allocations. Such projects were funded to the level previously announced, with an enhancement of up to 50 per cent. to cover associated professional fees, furniture and equipment, and a further adjustment for inflation. In general, allocations for approved projects are spread over a four-year period, in the ratio 10:50 30:10, though it was in practice possible to adjust the phasing of many projects in their second or subsequent year, where it was apparent from the authority's bid that the actual spending profile would differ significantly from the standard pattern. Authorities which had commenced projects outside the Department's programmes, using funds at their own disposal (eg. capital receipts, were expected to continue from that source).

Minor Works: Funds were distributed purely on the basis of student numbers, weighted using the same programme weightings as were used by the National Advisory Body for calculating recurrent funding. The total sum distributed under this heading was fixed at the level which would preserve the traditional 70:30 ratio for major:minor works.

Equipment: Half the available resources were distributed to authorities on the basis full-time equivalent student numbers, weighted using the NAB's programme weights. The balance was distributed pro rata to authorities' bids.

Land and Design Fees: Allocations were made only where essential expenditure was linked to a previously-approved major building project.

The provisional indications: Given for 1987-88 and 1988-89 relate only to major building projects which are within the Department's programmes and which were due to commence in 1986-87 or earlier. The provisional indications were calculated on the same basis as the major building project allocations for 1986-87, explained above.

Higher Education Spending

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from the University Grants Committee about the implications for universities of reductions in higher education spending.

Mr. Walden: My right hon. Friend has received no recent representations from the University Grants Committee on this subject, but he expects to do so shortly.

Advertising Agencies

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science which advertising agencies have been engaged by his Department for each of the past five years; and what sums each has been paid.

Sir Keith Joseph: The advertising agencies engaged by my Department for each of the past five years and the sums each have been paid are as follows:

Teachers (Statistics)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will publish available figures on the number of hours devoted to extra-curricular activities by (a) full-time and (b) part-time teachers in further and higher education;

(2) how many part-time teachers in further and higher education, respectively, began employment in each of the last five years.

Mr. Walden: This information is not collected centrally.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what pension schemes are available to part-time teachers in further and higher education; and on what criteria they are based.

Mr. Chris Patten: part-time teachers are not compulsorily subject to the teachers' superannuation scheme and are in consequence free to make their own personal pension arrangements. Part-time teachers in further and higher education (excluding universities) may elect to participate in teachers' superannuation if they are paid salary expressed as a proportion of the appropriate full-time rate. Alternatively, they may participate in the state earnings-related pension scheme if their earnings exceed the lower earnings limit.

I am sending the hon. Member general information about teachers' superannuation.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list, by region, in England and Wales, the number of (a) part-time and (b) full-time teachers in further and higher education (i) employed and (ii) made redundant in each of the last five years.

Mr. Walden: The readily available information is as follows:

* Part-time teachers are expressed as full-time equivalents. They are for the maintained sector only as at January of each year. The definition of a teacher in further education changed after 1983 so direct comparisons cannot be made for part-time staff.

† As at 31 March each year. Figures for 1985 are provisional only.

‡ Numbers of part-time teachers made redundant are not available. The figures shown include a small element for some university staff not shown in full-time employment.

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the average pay rise enjoyed by (a) part-time and (b) full-time teachers in further and higher education, respectively, in each of the last five years.

Sir Keith Joseph: The pay rates of part-time teachers are derived from those of full-time teachers and have increased by similar amounts except where states. Full-time teachers received the following pay increases*:

Date of settlement	Percentage increase
1 April 1981	†7·5
1 April 1982	5·8

¶ 5 per cent. from 1 April, 2 per cent. from 1 December on 31 March 1985 rates, and transfer of those on maximum of lecturer grade I scale to lecturer grade II scale from 1 September 1985.

A-level Examinations

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received about the standards achieved in mathematics and physics A-level examinations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: My right hon. Friend has received no recent representations on this issue.

University College, Cardiff

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will place in the Library the report which his Department has recently commissioned from the accountants Price Waterhouse about the financial situation of University College, Cardiff.

Mr. Walden: No. The report is confidential to the college, the University Grants Committee and the Government.

Donna de Groot and Stuart Ford

Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if, pursuant to his answer of 27 March, Official Report, columns 560-1, on the expected response from Bedfordshire local education authority on the further education of Donna de Groot and Stuart Ford, he has received any further information.

Mr. Chris Patten: A response to the Department's inquiries about further education provision for these two young people was received from Bedfordshire local education authority on 4 April. Cases of this kind raise difficult issues on which specialist guidance has to be sought before a conclusion can be reached, but the Department will complete its examination of the information provided as quickly as possible.

School Meals Census

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will place in the Library the school meals census for October 1985.

Mr. Dunn: In view of the disruption to the school meals service at that time, a detailed annual census was not carried out in October 1985. The responses of LEAs to a limited survey carried out in February and March 1986 on prices and policies only are currently being processed, and the results will be placed in the Library as soon as possible.

High Energy Physics

Sir John Osborn asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the progress being made by the Governments of the member countries of CERN to review expenditure on high energy physics following the meeting which he attended of CERN's council.

Mr. Walden [pursuant to his reply, 8 April 1986, c. 47.]: After the meeting of the CERN committee of council on 25 April, Professor Kummer, the president of council, announced that Professor A. Abragam would chair the review of the organisation, and issued the following statement.

"Professor, W. Kummer, President of CERN Council, is appointing on behalf of Council and after consultation with its Committee, which met on 25 April — seven European personalities to be members of the high — level group established by CERN Council last February for conducting an in-depth, comprehensive review of CERN. They are:

Professor A. Abragam (1914—France)
Nuclear and Solid State Physics
College de France. French Atomic Energy Commission.

Dr. M. Boyer (1939—Spain)
Economics and Physics

President of the 'Banco Exterior De Espana'

Dr. C. De Benedetti (1934—Italy)
Electrotechnical Engineer:
Managing Director of Olivetti.

Professor B. F. F. Fender (1934—UK)
Physical Chemistry:
Vice Chancellor of the University of Keele.

Professor W. Paul (1913—FRG)
Experimental Physics Bonn University

Mr. Haakon Sandvold (1921—Norway)
Engineer: Director of Ardal of Sunndal Verk A/S.

Professor J. Vodoz (1932—Switzerland)
Technical Sciences: President Amysa SA (Yverdon)
The Group is expected to start its work before this summer and to report to the CERN Council by June 1987."
This in-depth review was established following a UK initiative at a specially convened meeting of the CERN council in February and was reported to the House on 21 February at columns 355 and 356.

ENVIRONMENT

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which of the four sets of weightings for cost and radiological parameters as given in section 5.3 of the report on the "Assessment of the Best Practicable Environmental Options for Management of Low- and Intermediate-Level Solid Radioactive Waste" he proposes to recommend to the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive.

Mr. Waldegrave: The results of the assessment are being taken into account in developing the Government's policy for radioactive waste management. It is, however, neither necessary nor advisable to recommend to UK NIREX Ltd. any one set of precise weightings on costs and parameters. The weightings are illustrative, and the assessment addresses other factors that also need to be taken account of. The assessment shows that, whichever of its four sets of weightings is used, near-surface disposal of low level waste is radiologically and economically attractive.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportions of the total volume of the United Kingdom's intermediate- and low-level radioactive waste arise solely from the Magnox reactors and the reprocessing of their spent fuel; and what these proportions will be in 1990 and 2000.

Mr. Waldegrave: The proportions of low- and intermediate-level radioactive wastes arising from Magnox reactors and the reprocessing of their spent fuel will be as follows:

	Proportion of total volume
	By 1990 per cent.	By 2000 per cent.
Low-level waste arisings from 1986

Magnox fuel reprocessing and other activities at Sellafield	72	69
Intermediate-level waste stocks
Magnox reactors	21	18
Magnox fuel reprocessing and other activities at Sellafield	64	60

These figures are taken from the 1985 assessment of waste stocks and future arisings commissioned jointly by the Department of the Environment and NIREX. They do not take account of the potential for compaction of LLW.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby of 21 April, how much intermediate waste is produced per annum; where it is stored; and when present storage facilities will be exhausted at current rates of production.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what safeguards will operate to ensure that no high level nuclear waste is dumped at a site chosen for low level and intermediate nuclear waste.

Mr. Waldegrave: High-level nuclear waste is very easily distinguished and there is no possibility that it could be confused with low-level waste. It is intended that future authorisations to dispose of waste will require that containers are subject to planned and systematic quality assurance procedures which might involve both non-destructive and destructive tests. These methods are currently the subject of a research programme.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether detailed studies have been conducted regarding the effects of an earthquake on nuclear waste burial sites; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Seismic factors will be considered in the Department's assessment of all proposed nuclear waste disposal sites and the design to any associated structures.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what studies are being commissioned by his Department about the possible effects of radionuclides on the River Humber.

Mr. Waldegrave: Certain industrial premises on the Humber estuary are authorised under the Radioactive Substances Act 1960 to discharge very low concentrations of radionuclides arising from the presence of natural radioactivity in the feed stock materials. These concentrations are so low that it is considered that there could be no significant environmental effects and therefore no specific studies of the River Humber have been undertaken.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department has held any discussions with the National Farmers Union regarding the four nuclear waste disposal sites currently under investigation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have held no such discussions. If the National Farmers Union has views to offer, I shall be pleased to give them careful consideration.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is satisfied with the arrangements for ensuring that radioactive waste resulting from the reprocessing of imported spent oxide fuel is returned to the country of origin; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Satisfactory arrangements to return the wastes arising from the reprocessing of overseas contracts will be made. Decisions on the precise form and timing will be taken in the light of further studies.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether a local authority may refuse to allow a deposit of nuclear waste in its area under the regulations currently in force relating to hazardous waste substances; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: No. Disposal of nuclear waste is authorised under the Radioactive Substances Act 1960 and as such it is not subject to the Control of Pollution Act 1974 which covers other waste substances. Under section 9(5) of the 1960 Act there is a duty on a waste disposal authority to accept radioactive waste on a disposal site specified in an authorisation for disposal of that waste granted by the relevant Minister.

Mr. Lyell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the proposed capacity to store radioactive nuclear waste, in cubic metres, at each of the four sites, Bradwell, Elstow, Fulbeck and South Killingholme.

Mrs. Rumbold: The capacity will depend on the site and design of facility eventually chosen, and on the degree of compaction of wastes. In general terms it is currently intended that the site should accommodate arisings of waste over the next 40 to 50 years. Estimates of waste arisings over this period are given in the recent assessment of best practicable environmental options for management of radioactive wastes, published by Her Majesty's Stationery Office. Any of the four sites announced by NIREX, operated in conjunction with disposals at Drigg, would have more than adequate capacity.

Radiation

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what levels and types of radiation are classified by his Department as safe; and what are the criteria upon which those levels are based.

Mr. Waldegrave: The criteria are set out in detail in "Principles for the Protection of the Human Environment" Her Majesty's Stationery Office December 1984. Section 3.8 states that "the authorising Departments will be guided by the following objective: The risk to any member of the public in any one year from exposure to radiation from all sources other than background and medical exposure, should not be greater than that associated with a dose of 1mSv".

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, following the Chernobyl incident, he intends issuing instructions for monitoring of radiation levels to take place at locations other than those routinely in use.

Mrs. Rumbold: The present network of observation stations is very sensitive and capable of detecting small changes in the ambient level of radiation. Increasing the number of stations would add little to the amount of information gathered because radioactive particles and gases, brought to the United Kingdom by weather systems would almost certainly be dispersed over a wide area.

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those locations in the United Kingdom where ambient levels of radiation are routinely monitored.

Mrs. Rumbold: Stations for the monitoring of airborne dust and rainwater are maintained by the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Research Establishment and the National Radiation Protection Board at Lerwick (Shetland) Glasgow, Eskdalemuir (Dumfries), Milford Haven (Dyfed), Chilton (Oxon) and in London. There are three additional stations for the measurement of radioactivity in rainwater. Instruments to monitor radiation levels are also installed at the neclear power stations of the Central Electricity Generating Board.

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will compare normal background radiation levels with those levels of radiation recorded on Wednesday 30 April at Dounreay, Darlington, Didcot and Dulwich;

(2) if he will compare the normal levels of background radiation with those levels of radiation recorded on Thursday 1 May at Dounreay, Darlington, Didcot and Dulwich.

Mrs. Rumbold: I can confirm that the levels of radiation recorded on Wednesday 30 April and Thursday 1 May 1986 at all the monitoring stations maintained in the United Kingdom by the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority and the National Radiological Protection Board were no different from the normal background radiation levels. There is no reason to believe that readings taken at the places mentioned by the hon. Member would differ significantly from measurements taken at the monitoring stations.

Derelict Land

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, further to the answer of 30 January, Official Report, column 609, how much of the £17 million which he stated was available for land reclamation for Consett and Corby steelworks, the reclamation of coal tips, limestone subsidence in the Black Country the reclaiming of sites for the Stoke and Gateshead garden festivals and good quality groundwork schemes in urban areas will be spent under each heading; and how much land will be reclaimed by this expenditure.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend has now been able to increase the overall derelict land grant resources available in 1986-87 for these reclamation projects to over £20 million from the provisional sum of £17 million announced on 30 January. The funds earmarked for each project are now as follows:

	£ million
Former BSC steelworks at Consett	1·5
Former BSC steelworks at Corby	3·0
Coal Tip reclamation	6·0
Limestone Subsidence in the Black Country	5·0
Stoke National garden Festival	0·38
Gateshead National Garden Festival	2·3
Groundwork	1·9

The projects listed will reclaim over 1,600 hectares of derelict land over a number of years.

Property Services Agency

Sir Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many staff the Property Services Agency intend moving out of block D, Brooklands avenue, Cambridge, in order to accommodate staff from the area office in Newmarket; where these staff are going to be relocated; how much accommodation they will occupy; and how much this will cost.

Sir George Young: As I have already explained to my hon. Friend, we are still developing the reorganisation proposals for PSA eastern region and I shall write to him again when further costings, accommodation issues and other information are available.

Asbestos

Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what financial assistance is available from his Department to assist owner-occupiers towards the cost of removal of asbestos from domestic properties.

Sir George Young: Assistance may be available under the home improvement grant system where the removal of asbestos forms part of a larger scheme of improvement and repair work which is eligible for grant.

Communal Heating Systems

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, further to the hon. Member for Westminster, North's questions of 25 November 1985, Official Report, column 380 and 3 March 1986, Official Report, columns 32-3, he will report on the progress of his consultations with the local authorities and other interested bodies on the supply of heat to tenants from a communal system; and when he proposes to introduce regulations giving secure tenants who are supplied heat from a communal system a right to information about the cost of their heating.

Mr. John Patten: I refer to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend on 3 March 1986 at column 32. Preparation of the consultation letter is nearly completed and it will be issued very soon.

Housing (Coventry)

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on the amount of private sector accommodation available for rental in Coventry in each year since 1980.

Sir George Young: The available information is about accommodation occupied by households who were present on census night in 1981; it is contained in table 20 of the "Census 1981 County report for West Midlands, Part 1," a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much money is expected to be made available to Coventry city council under section 12 of the Housing Defects Act 1984 in (a) the current and (b) the next financial year.

Sir George Young: Coventry city council has not designated any properties under section 12 of the Housing Defects act. The council will receive Exchequer contributions towards grants or repurchases made in respect of properties designated nationally under section 1 of the Act (now section 528 of the Housing Act 1985), on the basis set out in that legislation.

Advertising Agencies

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which advertising agencies have been engaged by his Department for each of the past five years; and what sums each has been paid.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Since 1981-82 my Department has engaged the following agencies and has paid the sums as listed.

1981-82
Doyle Dane Bernbach	582,155
1982-83
J. Walter Thompson	433,361

Doyle Dane Bernbach	14,888
1984-85

J. Walter Thompson	481,219
Dorland	260,409
1985-86

Posterlink Selection Limited	30,639

In addition, over the same period, my Department has used the services of Charles Barker Advertising for the placing of statutory notices and advertising on behalf of the Property Services Agency, at a total cost of £500,000.

Land Sale, Gosport

Mr. Viggers asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, in the matter of the proposed tender sale of the site adjacent to the Wildgrounds, Gosport by the Property Services Agency, he will make it his policy that no sale shall take place unless the borough of Gosport shall have had the right to equal the best tender of any other prospective purchaser.

Sir George Young: The land will be offered for sale by public auction. The borough council will thus be able to assess the competition and bid accordingly.

Planning Appeals

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will now publish the results of the efficiency scrutiny carried out by his Department into the planning appeals system, including the action plan setting out the objectives for reducing median times for handling appeals.

Mr. Tracey: I shall answer this question shortly.

Owner-Occupiers

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the number of owner-occupiers for each year since 1979; and if he will estimate for each of these years what proportion these figures represent of the total number of households.

Sir George Young: It is estimated that about 12 million dwellings in England were owner-occupied at the end of December 1985; this was 64 per cent. of the total of 18·7 million dwellings. Figures for earlier years appear in table 9.3 of "Housing and Construction Statistics 1974-1984" a copy of which is in the Library.

Rates

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the percentage rate rise, at ratepayer level, between (a) 1981-82 and 1986-87, (b) 1982-83 and 1986-87 and (c) 1985-86 and 1986-87 in (i) each London borough and the City of London, (ii) each metropolitan district and (iii) each non-metropolitan district.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I have today placed the available information in the Library.

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment for each non-metropolitan county council what was (a) its rate precept in 1985-86, (b) its rate precept in 1986-87, (c) the percentage increase in rate precept in 1986-87, (d) its current expenditure in 1985-86, (e) its current current-expenditure in 1986-87 and (f) the percentage increase in current expenditure in 1986-87.

Expenditure

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish his latest estimate for local authorities in England, taken together, for (a) total budgeted expenditure for 1985-86, (b) the Government's planned expenditure for these authorities for 1986-87 and (c) total budgeted expenditure for 1986-87 showing in each case (i) total expenditure for block grant purposes and (ii) current expenditure.

Anglian Water Authority

Sir Eldon Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds of 24 April, Official Report, column 239, what are the problems about which he is in correspondence with the Anglian water authority on the subject of the Middle Level Transfer Order 1985; how soon he expects to resolve them; and if he will make a statement on the position of those farmers who contributed to the capital cost of providing the irrigation water they now are using under the terms of this order, pending its confirmation or extension.

Mr. John Patten: I shall answer this question shortly.

Housing Statistics

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many houses have been sold to sitting tenants by local authorities in each of the last 10 years; what was the average receipt to the authorities for each house sold; what was the average cost of (a) building new houses (b) rehabilitating old houses for local authorities in each year, and how many new houses and rehabilitated houses respectively he estimates local authorities could have built with the moneys available to them from the receipts of council house sales.

Sir George Young [pursuant to his reply, 30 April 1986, c. 413]: The available information is given in the table. There are other forms of housing expenditure that local authorities undertake, in addition to those mentioned. Therefore, my Department has not made the estimates requested.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Jasmine Beckford (Report)

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now give Her Majesty's Government's response to the report of the Committee of Inquiry into the death of Jasmine Beckford; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fowler: The report of the inquiry which was commissioned by the London borough of Brent and the Brent health authority has many recommendations for them to follow up. I am aware of the action being taken by them. But the report also made many proposals for consideration nationally by the Government and other bodies.

The Government fully support and welcome the main themes of the report. This means that those concerned with the care of children at risk of being abused must always put the interests of the child first. Where a child is in the care of a local authority they have a clear legal obligation to safeguard and promote the welfare of the child and in any conflict of interests between parents and child, those of the child must always come first.

These principles will be reiterated in a revised guide to authorities about the arrangements to be followed for the protection of children. We have placed great emphasis on ensuring that all staff are fully aware of the legal framework in this area and how it affects the responsibilities which they bear. It takes up a number or recommendations and concerns in the Beckford inquiry report, concentrating in particular on improving collaboration between health and local authorities. These and other bodies will be consulted about the content of the guidance. A copy of the draft guidance which aims to review and update existing advice has been placed in the Library of the House of Commons and is published today.

The Beckford report made a number of recommendations regarding the law and related court practice on child care. I announced last week that the Government intended to introduce a comprehensive Bill in child care law as soon as parliamentary time allowed. We shall be publishing a White Paper in the autumn and this will take account of the proposals in the Beckford report. In addition, the Government are seeking, through the private Member's legislation of my hon. Friend the Member for Westbury (Mr. Walters) power to make regulations governing arrangements by local authorities to allow a child in care to go home on trial. The Lord Chancellor has issued a circular to justices' clerks about procedures and training of magistrates taking account of the report's recommendations.

My Social Services Inspectorate has undertaken an urgent review of assessment by, and supervision of, social workers handling child abuse cases where a child in care has been returned home. This report and recommendations are also being published today and sent to all directors of social services by the Chief Inspector of the SSI. The Chief Inspector has stressed that the critical decision to return a child home on trial must always be taken at a senior level and in accordance with an agreed plan worked out with all the agencies concerned. Copies of the report have been placed in the Library of the House of Commons. In general, the cases studied showed evidence that local authorities give high priority to child abuse work and that cases were usually handled by qualified, experienced staff. Immediate action to protect children following reports of abuse was generally satisfactory. However, the report identifies room for improvements in planning and monitoring of arrangements for their longer term protection and makes recommendations. It highlights the need for a more systematic approach to the work and to the supervision of field-workers handling these difficult and demanding cases.

The messages are broadly similar to those in the Beckford report and my SSI will be following up its recommendations with authorities. We also intend to produce a practice guide for social workers in child abuse work and we will be considering nursing and health visitor practice in child abuse cases. In addition, new guidance on the action authorities should take to review their services following deaths or other serious cases of abuse, including formal inquiries where necessary, will be issued within the next few months. The training implications of the SSI report will be examined with the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work.

The report also made recommendations about research and training. We have a continuing programme of research on child care matters and, as resources allow, will give high priority to further work on child abuse. The proposed extention of basic social work training to three years was already under consideration between CCETSW, other relevant bodies and the Government and a decision will be taken in due course. We are making £300,000 available over the next three years towards developing training and educational programmes, particularly aimed at the problem of sexual abuse of children. We have drawn to the attention of other national bodies those recommendations concerning their responsibilities.

We are grateful to Mr. Blom Cooper and his team for the careful thought their report has given towards better ways of achieving the common objective of us all—the protection of children from abuse. The Government's aim is to promote positive improvements in services wherever these are needed and we will continue to pursue this as a matter of urgency.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will explain the evidence which caused him to place the drug Mucodyne on the limited list for children only; and if he will make the drug available on prescription to all age groups.

Mr. Hayhoe: Carbocisteine—of which Mucodyne is one brand name version — is not available under the National Health Service for all children. It is available for prescription only to assist in the management of children with tracheostomies as recommended by the Advisory Committee on NHS Drugs. The committee's advice is given to Ministers in confidence.

NHS (Housing Stock)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of National Health Service housing stock is to be retained to accommodate junior medical and dental staff, nursing and midwifery students and those training to be members of professions allied to medicine.

Mr. Hayhoe: This information will not be available until authorities' plans are all in final form.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many units of housing stock have been declared surplus to requirements under his Department's circular HC(85)19; and how many of these units are currently occupied;

(2) what are the total numbers of housing units and the percentages which are currently vacant owned by each health authority.

Mr. Hayhoe: I will provide a summary of health authorities' plans when they have been approved by the Department. Information about the number currently occupied is not held centrally.

Benefits (Claimants)

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the number of (a) single payments and (b) urgent needs payments, weekly and one-off, paid to claimants who (i) are under pensionable age and are not required to register for work, (ii) are under pensionable age required to register for work and (iii) are over pensionable age; and what is (x) the average rate per 1,000 claimants in (i), (ii) and (iii), (y) the average payment made to claimants in (i), (ii) and (iii) and (z) the number of claimants in (i), (ii) and (iii) with dependent children for the latest available year at Bloomsbury, Finsbury Park, Highgate, Hoxton and Stoke Newington area offices of his Department.

Mr. Major: The following table sets out the information available on (a) single payments and (b) urgent needs payments made by offices specified for the year ending April 1986 for the categories requested. Information about claimants with dependent children is not available.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a table showing the number and percentage of households and persons in Scotland below, at, or up to 40 per cent. above supplementary benefit level in 1979, 1981 and 1983.

Mr. Major: I shall let the hon. Member have the information as soon as possible after the low income families tables for 1983 are placed in the Library.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish the December 1984 figures for (a) the numbers in receipt of supplementary benefit and (b) the numbers dependent on supplementary benefit, and distinguishing in each case between retirement pensioners, the unemployed, the sick and disabled, one parent families, widows and others.

Mr. Major: Provisional figures for the number in receipt of supplementary benefit are given in the table. It is regretted that information about the number of dependants is not yet available.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in each of the years since 1979 for which figures are available (1) how many representations he has received asking him to use the discretion conferred upon him under section 20 of the Supplementary Benefits Act 1976 not to recover recoverable overpayments of supplementary benefit; (2) in how many instances he used this discretion not to recover such overpayments; how many of the representations came in the first instance from: (a) the claimant or his or her representative or advocate, including an honourable Member, and (b) from his Department; in how many of the instances the initial representation was made to him by: (a) the claimant, (b) the claimant's representative or advocate and (c) his Department; what was the average amount, per claimant, involved in (1) above; and what was the average amount, per claimant involved in (2) above.

Mr. Major: The information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Advertising Agencies

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which advertising agencies have been engaged by his Department for each of the past five years; and what sums each have been paid.

Mr. Fowler: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Hypothermia

Mr. Neil Thorne asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many deaths have occurred in the London borough of Havering during each of the last five years which have been attributed to hypothermia as a primary or contributary cause;

(2) how many deaths have occurred in the London borough of Redbridge during each of the last five years which have been attributed to hypothermia as a primary or contributary cause;

(3) how many deaths have occurred in the London borough of Barking and Dagenham during each of the last five years which have been attributed to hypothermia as a primary or contributary cause;

(4) how many deaths have occurred in the London borough of Waltham Forest during each of the last five years which have been attributed to hypothermia as a primary or contributary cause;

(5) how many deaths have occurred in the London borough of Newham during each of the last five years which have been attributed to hypothermia as a primary or contributary cause;

(6) how many deaths have occurred in the London borough of Tower Hamlets during each of the last five years which have been attributed to hypothermia as a primary or contributary cause.

Mr. Whitney: The numbers of deaths with any mention of hypothermia on the death certificate, irrespective of whether it did or did not appear as the underlying cause of death, to usual residents of the London boroughs of Barking and Dagenham, Havering, Newham, Redbridge, Tower Hamlets and Waltham Forest for 1981 to 1985 are shown in the table.

Re-establishment Centres

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what progress he is making with the proposed transfer of re-establishment centres to the Manpower Services Commission and to other suitable agencies; and if he will make a statement;

(2) when he expects to be able to reply to the Second Report from the Social Services Committee, Session 1985-86, on resettlement units and re-establishment centres;

(3) when he expects to be able to announce the future of his Department's resettlement unit in Southampton; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: There is no proposition to transfer re-establishment centres to the Manpower Services Commission. We are considering the extent to which the range of help available to the long-term unemployed duplicates the facilities available to re-establishment centre users. We shall then make a final decision about the future of the re-establishment centres. The community programme, for example, is to be increased to 255,000 places by November 1986. By March 1987 this improved provision should make it possible to assist all the long-term unemployed as they reach 12 months unemployment. Each person referred to a Manpower Services Commission employment adviser will have an initial interview at which the availability of jobs and the appropriateness of training will be considered. Links between employment advisers and DHSS unemployment review officers will be strengthened to match people with the most suitable Manpower Services Commission programme.

I hope to be able to reply shortly to the second report from the Social Services Committee, Session 1985-86. In so far as the resettlement unit in Southampton is concerned, no decisions have yet been made. Regionally-based teams have been asked to report on alternative provision for all DHSS resettlement units and their findings will be discussed and the issues drawn together at a national resettlement conference on 3 June. The views of the conference on the criteria against which individual proposals should be judged will be available to Ministers when they consider the regional reports.

Limb Fitting Service

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what change in structure and organisation of the limb fitting service have taken place in his Department (a) in the year prior to the establishment of the McColl committee, (b) during the working of the McColl committee and (c) since the publication of the McColl report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: It would have been premature to make organisational changes in the artificial limb service immediately before the working party was set up or while it was sitting. Some important improvements in the service not requiring reorganisation, such as the introduction of the new light-weight limb systems, were nevertheless made. We do not expect to make decisions on major changes before the completion of consultations which are currently in progress and initial work being carried out under the direction of the National Health Service management board. As an interim measure we have created a senior post—general manager of disablement services — to be responsible for carrying this work forward without delay and to be accountable to the board for the operation of the services of artificial limb and appliance centres.

Disabled People (Motor Cars)

Mr. Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the expert individuals and organisations in the field of road transport and disability whom he consulted regarding the issue of automatic gear-boxes for right leg amputees; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Informal Carers

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give full details of the areas covered, the numbers of people covered and an outline of what is involved, in each project for support of informal carers, as outlined in his Department's press release 86/127 of 16 April.

Mr. Whitney: Demonstration districts of services for informal carers have recently been established in East Sussex, Stockport and Sandwell. In each area DHSS will be providing up to £600,000 to be spent over three years to initiate, extend and improve services provided by voluntary organisations. The selection and management of the projects to be supported will be the responsibility of the voluntary sector, working with the co-operation of the social services and health authorities. The Department's social services inspectorate is co-ordinating the projects and the Tavistock institute is undertaking the evaluation. It is too soon to say how many people will be directly assisted by the demonstration projects.

Residential Homes

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many local authority old people's residential homes have been sold, or put up for sale, in each year between 1979 to 1986, including (a) the names of the homes, (b) the numbers of elderly residents, (c) the local authority concerned and (d) the political party in control of each authority at the relevant time.

Mr. Whitney: The information requested is not held centrally.

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many private residential care homes and nursing homes have had their registration cancelled as a result of providing an inadequate service during the past five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: Information about cancelled registrations has been notified to us only since 1 January 1985. Up to 31 March 1986, six residential care homes and two nursing homes had had their registrations cancelled. Three of the former were on grounds that included the poor quality of the services or facilities.

Board and Lodging Payments

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the average length of waiting time between application and receipt for board and lodging payments at his Department's Regency street, London office; and what was the national average for (a) 1985 and (b) each month of 1986.

Mr. Major: I regret that no information is available centrally on the average length of waiting time between application and receipt for board and lodging payments. Individual statistics on these cases are not kept routinely so that information could be obtained only by a special exercise which would be disproportionately expensive.

Social Fund

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish details of (a) training to be given to social fund officers for race awareness, (b) arrangements to be made for claimants whose written and spoken English is poor and (c) the funds to be made available for interpreters.

Mr. Newton: These aspects will be considered as the detail of the social fund is developed.

Psychiatric Patients, Lincoln

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much additional funding has been allocated to North Lincolnshire dirstrict health authority to provide community care for psychiatric patients discharged from St. John's Hospital, Lincoln.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Suicides

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many suicides there have been in the last year, and each year from 1979 to 1985, within the North Lincolnshire area; and how many of these were existing or past psychiatric patients.

Mr. Whitney: The table gives the numbers of suicides to usual residents of the north Lincolnshire health area from 1979 to 1985.

It is not known centrally how many of these were existing or past psychiatric patients.

Numbers of deaths from suicide, persons, all ages North Lincolnshire health areas 1979 to 1985

Lincolnshire North Health District	1979	19
	1980	18
	1981	24
North Lincolnshire District Health Authority	1982	25
	1983	21
	1984	25
	*1985	21

* figures for 1985 are provisional

Ethnic Survey

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he intends to produce guidelines for the recording of ethnic origin with details of individual social security claims; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: We have no intention of producing guidelines for the recording of the ethnic origin of claimants as part of social security claims procedures. This is not information which claimants are required to furnish before their claim is determined by the adjudication officer.

National Insurance Contributions

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will set out in a table the national insurance contributions liability at its weekly equivalent of (a) contracted-in employees through class 1, (b) contracted-out employees through class 1 and (c) self-employed people through class 2 contributions and class 4 contributions net of tax relief, in 1986-87, assuming their income is at the following constant levels throughout the year (i) £38, £60, £95, £285, and £1,000 per week, (ii) £2,075 and £4,450 per year and (iii) 0·5, 1·0, and 2·0 times average female earnings and 0·5, 0·75 and 1·5 times average male earnings, respectively, and at the minimum level of income to benefit in full from the tax relief on class 4 contributions at 40 per cent., 45 per cent., 50 per cent., 55 per cent., and 60 per cent. as a single person with no other tax allowances;

(2) what would be the current level of class 2 national insurance contributions if they had not been reduced in October 1985 and if they had been increased in April 1986 in line with the usual formula; and at that level what would be the extra income to the national insurance fund or the Exchequer;

(3) what level of class 2 and class 4 contributions would be necessary to ensure that the self-employed paid the full actuarial cost of the benefits which they receive;

(4) what would be the gain to the national insurance fund or the Exchequer of removing the upper earnings limit from national insurance payments for the self-employed (a) with present tax relief and (b) without it;

(5) what would be the gain to the national insurance fund or the Exchequer of removing the upper earnings limit for class 1 national insurance contributions; and what reduction could be made in the standard rate of contribution using that gain;

(6) what would be the gain to the national insurance fund or the Exchequer of removing the reduced rates of national insurance for very low earners, in such a way that the full rate of contribution were payable down to the lower earnings limit.

Mr. Major: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Computers

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what guidelines Her Majesty's Government is issuing on inter-departmentally linked computer-held information in the light of the White Paper plans for up-dating the Department of Health and Social Security system; and who will have access to the up-dated computers in the Department of Health and Social Security and under what circumstances.

Mr. Major: There are no current plans to issue guidelines on inter-departmentally linked computer-held information in the light of the White Paper plans to update the Department's computer systems. We have firm plans to link with only one other Department — the Department of Employment. The two Departments already work closely together, using computerised systems, for the provision of social security benefits. The Department of Employment acts as agent for the DHSS in the payment of unemployment benefit and supplementary allowance for the unemployed and this Department has responsibility for the two unemployment benefit computer centres at Reading and Livingston.

The new computerisation plans involving the two Departments include the provision of terminals and visual display units in local unemployment benefit offices, providing staff there with a direct link to these two mainframe computers—previously they were linked by the overnight telegraph system. The terminals and VDUs are currently being installed, in an average of 10 new offices a week, on a rolling programme stretching into 1987. This new facility allows unemployment benefit staff to input, amend and update claims immediately, and gives them instant information to answer benefit claimants' inquiries.

This system also provides access to the DHSS general index for the purpose of tracing national insurance numbers necessary in the processing of an unemployment benefit claim. This facility will be retained when the general index is absorbed into the new departmental central index which is to be developed from 1988.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what reciprocal arrangements with Northern Ireland have been made under section 31 of the Supplementary Benefits Act 1976.

Mr. Major: None. It has not been necessary to make use of this power since problems which have arisen over co-ordination with the Northern Ireland system of supplementary benefits have been resolved by other means.

Millvale House, Croxteth

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will cause an inspection to be made of conditions and food at Millvale House, Croxteth, Liverpool; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) on 1 May 1986 at column 468.

Private Nursing Homes

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps his Department takes to seek to ensure that private nursing homes are properly inspected and are providing an adequate service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: To ensure that standards are maintained, private nursing homes must be registered by district health authorities, and inspected by them at least twice a year. The statutory requirements are set out in the Registered Homes Act 1984 and the Nursing Homes and Mental Nursing Homes Regulations 1984. In addition, the Department has issued guidance to health authorities and commended a handbook produced by the National Association of Health Authorities.

Ethnic Minorities (Psychiatric Treatment)

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps the Mental Health Act Commission is taking to seek to ensure equal and appropriate psychiatric treatment for ethnic minorities.

Mr. Whitney: The Mental Health Act Commission's broad remit is to protect the interests of all detained mental patients regardless of ethnic origin. The commission's first biennial report (House of Commons Paper 586, October 1985) discusses ethnic issues and the commission's response to them.

Involuntary Mental Patients

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, what measures the Mental Health Act

Commission is taking to investigate the high number of black people admitted as involuntary patients under the Mental Health Act.

Mr. Whitney: No such measures are being taken. A person may be detained under the provisions of the Mental Health Act only if he or she is seriously mentally disordered. The circumstances in which a person may be compulsorily detained and the persons with power to decide on detention are set out in the Act.

Transcultural Psychiatry

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much money is currently being spent on research into the area of transcultural psychiatry; and on what projects this money is spent.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Family Income Supplement

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the latest estimate of the number of people in receipt of family income supplement.

Mr. Major: At February 1986, the latest date for which information is available, there were 202,000 families in receipt of family income supplement.

Organ Donors (Computer Records)

Mr. George Gardiner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether any studies have been undertaken to determine the feasibility of keeping central or regional computer records of all who have indicated their willingness to donate their organs for transplant upon death.

Mr. Whitney: The costs and practical implications of establishing and maintaining a free standing national computer register of people in England willing to become organ donors were examined by the Department in 1980, and we recently looked at these again in the light of current computer costs. We are not convinced that at the present time the benefits would justify the large expenditure required. A scheme using a computer register was launched earlier this year which aims to cover the whole of Wales, and we have asked to be kept informed of evaluations of its effect on the supply of donor organs. Studies were also prepared prior to the setting up of local computer registers in Manchester and Glasgow.

Nurses (Pay)

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was (a) the percentage award recommended by the review body for staff nurses and ward sisters in 1985 and (b) the percentage each category received in the 12 months ended 1 April.

Mr. Hayhoe: The information is as follows:

	Percentage increases and basic pay rates
	(a) 1985-86 Review Body Recommendation	(b) 1985-86 Pay Award
		From 1.4.85	From 1.2.86	Total 1985-86
Staff Nurse
Min.	11.2 (£6,000)	4·8 (£5,708)	1·9 (£6,000)	6·6
Max.	9·0 (£7,175)	4·8 (£6,960)	1·5 (£7,175)	6·3
Nursing Sister II (Ward Sister)
Min.	9·6 (£7,480)	4·8 (£7,220)	1·6 (£7,480)	6·4
Max.	14·3 (£10,000)	4·8 (£9,254)	2·4 (£10,000)	7·2

Notes:

(1) The Government accepted the recommendations of the review in full but payment was staged: the first instalment with effect from 1 April 1985 and the balance with effect from 1 February 1986.

(2) Many staff nurses and ward sisters receive additional payments for working unsocial hours and overtime. The average gross earnings in 1985-86 of a staff nurse and ward sister in Great Britain are estimated to be of the order of £7,938 and £10,175 respectively.

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has yet received the report of the review body on nurses' pay for the award which was due on 1 April.

Mr. Hayhoe: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has received the report of the Review Body for Nursing Staff, Midwives, Health Visitors and Professions Allied to Medicine. This is being considered and an announcement will be made in due course.

Potassium Iodate (Stocks)

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what stocks of potassium iodide are kept for use in the event of threat from radioactive fallout; how these stocks are distributed throughout the United Kingdom; and what plans are in hand to ensure their maintenance and replenishment.

Mr. Whitney: Stocks of potassium iodate tablets are held in the vicinity of all civil nuclear installations in Great Britain. They are held either on the site, or at nearby police stations, or hospitals. Maintenance and replenishment of stocks are subject to local arrangements.

Unemployment Benefit

Sir Russell Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the rate of unemployment benefit in April in each of the years 1980 to 1985.

Mr. Major: I refer the hon. Member to the publication "Social Security Statistics 1985", a copy of which is in the Library.

Mobility Allowance

Mr. Gordon Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will introduce legislation to extend mobility allowance to those persons who would qualify on grounds of disability but who are debarred from allowance solely because their application was made after their 65th birthday.

Mr. Newton: Claims for mobility allowance can be made by people aged up to the 66th birthday but they have to show that the medical conditions for entitlement were satisfied before they reached age 65. We have no plans to change these limits.

Medical Students

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about the education of medical students in racial and cultural factors; and if any changes are proposed in this area.

Mr. Hayhoe: None. Under the Medical Act 1983 the General Medical Council is responsible for determining the knowledge and skill needed for a medical qualification.

Psychiatric Illness (Statistics)

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information is collected by his Department about the incidence of particular psychiatric diagnoses and the breakdown of the incidence by reference to age, sex and ethnic origin; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: Relevant diagnostic information, but not ethnic origin, is collected through the mental health inquiry in respect of patients admitted to mental illness and mental handicap hospitals and units and the special hospitals in England. For mental illness hospitals and units, summaries of the available diagnostic data by age and sex are contained in booklet No. 12 (Diagnostic data) in the series of DHSS booklets "Mental Health Statistics for England", copies of which are in the Library.

Special Health Authorities

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to abolish (a) all special health authorities and (b) the Bethlem Royal hospital and the Maudsley hospital special health authority.

Mr. Whitney: We have no such plans.

Maudsley Hospital

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why the visit to the Maudsley hospital by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Wycombe (Mr. Whitney) planned for 13 May has been cancelled.

Mr. Whitney: My visit to Maudsley hospital was postponed from 13 May until 15 May because of the likelihood of inescapable parliamentary commitments on the earlier date.

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why his officials visited the Maudsley hospital on 25 April.

Mr. Whitney: Departmental officials make regular visits to the Maudsley hospital but I am aware of no visit made by officials on 25 April.

Bethlem Royal Hospital

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what observations the Government's health advisory service has recently made about treatment of adolescents at the Bethlem royal hospital.

Mr. Whitney: I assume the hon. Lady is referring to the National Health Service health advisory service's recent report "Bridges over Troubled Waters" on services for disturbed adolescents, which was published in April. The report refers inter alia, to the services provided at the Bethlem royal hospital and I am sending the hon. Lady a copy.

Mentally Ill Children

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what facilities are available for inpatient treatment of seriously disturbed mentally ill children in south-east England.

Mr. Whitney I regret that this information is not held centrally. The hon. Member may therefore wish to contact the chairmen of the regional health authorities for the information she seeks.

Generic Services (UK) Ltd.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether Generic Services (UK) Ltd. has a United Kingdom manufacturers' licence to manufacture medicinal dosage forms or to package by limited assembly only;

(2) if he will list the overseas sources of the manufacture of medicines in respect of which product licences have been granted to Generic Services (UK) Ltd.; and whether all these sources have been inspected by the British Medicines Inspectorate in the last 12 months.

Mr. Hayhoe: No information is available concerning Generic Services (UK) Ltd.

Residential Accommodation

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what arrangements he has made to monitor the repair and decoration of residential accommodation which district health authorities retain, and to ensure that the guidance in HC(85)19, to the effect that staff who need to be resident should be housed in accommadation of good quality and that authorities should regard bringing the retained stock of accommodation up to a reasonable standard as a priority charge on the proceeds of sale, is followed.

Mr. Hayhoe: No specific arrangements have been made; the monitoring of district health authorities' performance is a matter for regional health authorities.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will issue a health circular instructing district health authorities to ensure that surplus National Health Service accommodation will, wherever possible, be offered to tenants for purchase and that where it is not possible to make the offer or where tenants are unwilling to purchase the accommodation, they will be given at least one year to make alternative arrangements even where those staff no longer qualify for accommodation.

Mr. Hayhoe: Circular HC(85)19, issued in July 1985, contains these provisions for staff who have been tenants for at least two years. It is open to authorities to sell surplus properties to staff with shorter tenancies, but not at concessionary prices.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many district health authorities have sought regional health authority and Department of Health and Social Security approval for the provision of accommodation to staff other than junior medical and dental staff, nursing and midwifery students and trainees for the professions allied to medicine.

Mr. Hayhoe: Virtually every authority has sought approval to retain some accommodation for staff other than professional trainees.

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many units of accommodation comprised in National Health Services houses and self-contained flats would be sold off if the action plans so far submitted by district health authorities to regional health authorities outlining their proposals for accommodating employees in line with HC(85)19, were implemented;

(2) how many units of accommodation in nursing hostels would be sold off if the action plans so far submitted by district health authorities to regional health authorities outlining their proposals for accommodating employees in line with HC(85)19, were implemented.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that this information is not available centrally.

Claims

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average time which is now being taken to process (a) attendance allowance claims and (b) mobility allowance claims.

Mr. Newton: The average time taken for a claimant to receive payment, where the claim is successful at the initial stage, is currently 8½ weeks for attendance allowance and 7½ weeks for mobility allowance.

Regional Health Authorities

Mr. Rowe asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give details of the latest revenue allocations, activity and staffing figures for Yorkshire regional health authority, and comparable figures for 1978-79.

Mr. Hayhoe: Since 1978-79 there have been considerable improvements in the provision of health care in Yorkshire regional health authority. This has been funded by real growth in resource allocation and by health authorities continuing cost improvement programmes. Key figures are given in the table.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give details of the latest revenue allocations, activity and staffing figures for Trent regional health authority, and comparable figures for 1978-79.

Mr. Hayhoe: Since 1978-79 there have been considerable improvements in the provision of health care in Trent regional health authority. This has been funded by real growth in resource allocation and by health authorities continuing cost improvement programmes. Key figures are given in the table.

Dentistry (Statistics)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what has been the proportion of five-year-olds with dental decay in each year since 1974;

(2) what has been the proportion of people with no remaining natural teeth in each year since 1974.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Dental Treatment (Capitation Fees)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list those areas covered by the pilot scheme of capitation fees for dentists for child patients;

(2) if he will list those areas to be covered by the extended experiment in paying capitation fees for dentists for child patients.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the number of persons per general dental practitioner by health district.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Primary Health Care

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will place in the Library the data on which paragraph 7 of chapter 6 of the Green Paper on "Primary Health Care" is based.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the performance indicators established for family practitioner committees.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what has been the cost in each year since 1979 of medicines prescribed by doctors and dentists;

(2) what has been the cost in each year since 1979 of dispensing medicines prescribed by doctors and dentists.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

General Practice (Premises)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give a breakdown of the total spent in each year since 1979 by the Government on premises for general practice in both cash and constant prices.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Bonamia Disease

Sir David Price asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received from representatives of the Shellfish Association and the Southern Sea Fisheries Committee in respect of Bonamia disease in oysterages; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The disease Bonamia has recently been found in oyster beds at Poole harbour and in the Solent area and all holders of licences permitted to deposit molluscan shellfish from these areas have been notified. My officials recently met representatives of the Shellfish Association of Great Britain and the Southern Sea Fisheries Committee to discuss the present situation and are now urgently reviewing all aspects of policy on Bonamia.

Agriculture (Support)

Mr. Wigley asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total cost in the United Kingdom of support for the agriculture industry in 1985; and what proportion he estimates of the total cost of (a) food production and (b) food purchase by customers, this represents.

Mrs. Fenner: The estimate provision for voted expenditure in the United Kingdom on agriculture, fisheries and food, before deducting receipts of £1,781 million (mainly contributions from the European Community), was £3,170 million in 1985-86. This represents about one quarter of the value of agricultural gross output and fish landings estimated for 1985 and just under one-tenth of estimated total expenditure on food by consumers, including caterers.

It should be noted that the total expenditure includes that on food R & D, flood protection, forestry and administration which does not necessarily benefit directly the farming sector.

Agricultural Employees

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the number of full-time employees employed in agriculture at the latest available date compared with 1956, 1966 and 1976; and if he will provide separate figures for horticulture.

Mrs. Fenner: Numbers of regular whole-time workers employed in agriculture and horticulture in England and Wales, as recorded in the annual June census for the years 1956, 1966, 1976 and 1985, are shown in the table below. Figures for workers employed in horticulture are not separately available.

	Total Regular Whole Time Workers (a) ('000)
1956	454·7
1966	294·7
1976	184·0
1985	139·5

(a) Total regular whole-time workers comprise regular whole-time family workers, male and female; regular whole-time hired workers, male and female; and salaried managers.

Frozen Foods

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if Her Majesty's Government have any plans to seek to renegotiate the tariffs applied to imports into Spain of frozen vegetables from the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: Yes. We are actively seeking a reduction in the Spanish tariff on frozen peas.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the implications to the Spanish market of frozen vegetables from the United Kingdom of the increase in tariffs on such goods imposed by the Spanish Government since Spain's accession to the European Economic Community.

Mrs. Fenner: It is difficult at this stage to make any precise assessment, but clearly an increase in the tariff will be unhelpful to our exporters.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) when Her Majesty's Government first became aware of that the terms of the Spanish Treaty of Accession to the European Economic Community would increase the duty on frozen vegetable exports from the United Kingdom to Spain from 4·1 per cent. to 15·7 per cent.; and if he will make a statement;

(2) why Her Majesty's Government agreed to those provisions of the Spanish Treaty of Accession to the European Economic Community which had the effect of increasing the duty on exports of frozen vegetables from the United Kingdom to Spain; what steps were taken to negotiate more favourable terms for the United Kingdom in this regard; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: I refer the hon. Member to my replies of 8 April at column 35 and 11 April at column 203.

European Community Currency Unit

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what value was attached to the dollar in terms of the market rate for the European currency unit for the current European Economic Community budget; how this compares with the current value; and what is the relationship between the value of the dollar and expenditure under the budget.

Mr. Gummer: In drawing up their estimates of agricultural expenditure for the 1986 budget the Commission assumed a rate of 1·20 ecu to the US dollar. For the week ending 29 April 1986 the rate was 1·03 ecu to the dollar.

The prices for commodities in world markets are commonly expressed in US dollars so a fall in the dollar generally leads to increased Community expenditure on export refunds and aids in certain sectors, while a rise in the dollar tends to reduce expenditure. However a change in the value of the dollar sometimes causes an offsetting movement in world prices which means that there is not a simple relationship between the value of the dollar and agricultural expenditure.

Fishing Industry

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what information he has about (a) food subsidies, (b) loans, grants or subsidies for new holdings, (c) the same for renovation, (d) subsidisation of port facilities and (e) subsidisation of repair yards and facilities for the fishing industry in Denmark, France, Holland and Spain.

Mr. Gummer: The responsibility for monitoring national aids rests with the European Commission. We do not attempt to duplicate this work by maintaining a full inventory of such aids. However, we are constantly on the alert for national aids which appear to breach the treaty and are ready to refer substantiated cases to the Commission and to press strongly for action to be taken.

Food Exports

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will publish in the Official Report the tonnage of basic foodstuffs exported by the United Kingdom to (i) other European Economic Community countries and (ii) third countries in 1983, 1984, and 1985; and how this compares with the figures for 1970.

Mrs. Fenner: The information requested is published by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise in "Overseas Trade Statistics of the United Kingdom", copies of which are available in the House of Commons Library.

Advertising Agencies

Mr. Clay asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which advertising agencies have been engaged by his Department for each of the past five years; and what sums each has been paid.

Mr. Jopling: My Department has engaged Charles Barker Recruitment Ltd during each of the past five years. The following sums were paid:

Financial year	£
1981-82	63,303
1982-83	94,170
1983-84	75,621
1984-85	72,307
1985-86	82,254

Levies and World Prices

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether, pursuant to the reply of 21 April, Official Report, column 42, concerning levies and world prices, he will also give figures for breadmaking wheat, rapeseed and dairy products other than butter.

Mrs. Fenner: Levies and monetary compensatory amounts (MCA) are fixed for common wheat, no distinction being made for different qualities. No import levies or MCAs apply to rapeseed. The information requested for milk products (other than that for butter and skimmed milk powder which was included in the earlier reply) is set out in the table.

Levy and monetary compensatory amount applicable in the United Kingdom, threshold price and notional "world price" on 9 April 1986 for milk products.

n.a. Not applicable.
All figures have been rounded to the nearest £.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what effect the European Economic Community price settlement will have on the figures for levies and world prices given in the reply of 21 April, Official Report, column 42.

Mrs. Fenner: The main elements of the recent price settlement will not be implemented until the beginning of the 1986-87 marketing years. "World" prices, and therefore import levies, are influenced by many factors: furthermore, monetary compensatory amounts determined for the United Kingdom depend on the strength of sterling and may vary weekly. It is, therefore, not possible to predict accurately future levels of levies and "world" prices.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give the dollar cross-rate of exchange used in calculating the world prices referred to in the answer of 21 April, Official Report, column 42.

Mrs. Fenner: The implicit exchange rate was £1=1·465 US dollars.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish in the Official Report, a table showing the amount set aside in the budget for the common agricultural policy each year since 1972 and the amount actually spent; and what is the forecast for the current year.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Hill Farming

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list for 1984 and 1985 and give his estimate for the current year of the grants and subsidies for hill farming referred to in the reply of 8 May 1985, Official Report, column 459; if he will provide separate figures for sheep, including the pro-rata contribution on sheepmeat subsidy; and if he will state the total taxpayer contribution to the production of hill sheep as a percentage of the farmer's return on the animal.

Mr. Jopling: The latest figures available in the form given in the earlier reply are for calendar year 1984.

Grant Paid in 1984

	£ million
Hill Livestock Compensatory Allowances	85·712
Development Plans	32·398
Joint Investment Schemes	0·041
Total	118·151

Further details on less favoured area support are given in part IV of table 28 of the "Annual Review of Agriculture 1986", including a forecast for grant paid in the financial year 1985-86.

It is not possible to identify how much of the support under the Community sheepmeat regime is paid to hill farmers; the variable premium is paid on slaughter lambs, and those originating from hill farms are not separately identified in the figures.

I regret that, as a result, meaningful estimates of the taxpayers' contribution to the production of hill sheep cannot be made.

Agriculture Costs

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his estimate of the cost of support to United Kingdom agriculture directly and indirectly in the current year; and what was the comparable average figure for the years 1967 to 1970.

Mr. Jopling: Total provision, net of receipts, for expenditure by the three agricultural Departments and the intervention board for agricultural produce on agriculture, fisheries and food, including land drainage and flood protection and agency services provided by other public bodies, in 1986-87 is:

	£ million
Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food	504
Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland	130
Welsh Office	43
Intervention Board for Agricultural produce	375
Total	1,052

Outturn figures for the financial years 1967-68 to 1970-71 are set out in the table:

£ million

	1967-68	1968-69	1969-70	1970-71
Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food*	315	304	312	343
Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland	59	59	62	67
Total	374	363	374	410

* includes Wales.

Trichinella Spiralis

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food why testing for trichinella spiralis is not carried out in-house by the state veterinary service.

Mrs. Fenner: The arrangements in force were set up to comply with a German requirement that testing be carried out close to the slaughterhouse.

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the cost per carcase if current testing for trichinella spiralis was carried out within the state veterinary service.

Mrs. Fenner: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

British Sherry

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 30 April, Official Report, column 440, why the provisions on British sherry in article 129 of the Treaty of Accession of Spain and Portugal required to be enacted as a means of providing for the continued use of this description; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Agricultural Holdings

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will bring up to date the information on the size and ownership of agricultural holdings given in his answer of 22 July 1982, Official Report, columns 251-4.

Mrs. Fenner: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Beef and Butter Intervention Storage

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his reply of 28 April, Official Report, column 317-8, what is the total, current annual cost of beef and butter intervention storage in the Greater London area.

Mr. Jopling: Storage costs at individual stores vary according to the quantities held, which fluctuate, and are not recorded separately for particular areas. Total intervention storage and related costs for beef and butter in the 1985-86 financial year are estimated at £42 million.

Agricultural Expenditure

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what new areas of spending by national government on agriculture are permitted or obliged under the 1986 farm price review proposals; what restrictions have been placed under the agreement on the extent of such national funding; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 1 May 1986, c. 476]: As part of the CAP price fixing agreement reached on 25 April member states will be permitted to top up Community payments under the milk quota buy-up scheme. The detailed rules for this remain to be fixed. Also member states will be permitted to fix and provide short-term private storage aid for wine; and the Council agreed a reduction in the Community's reimbursement to member states for their national expenditure on the financing and technical costs of intervention storage.

If member states adopt national measures affecting agriculture they are required to ensure that they are in accordance with the state aids provisions of the treaty of Rome.

PRIME MINISTER

Nuclear Tests (British Service Men)

Mr. Clay asked the Prime Minister when she will reply to letters sent to her on 9 January and 21 April from Mr. Ken McGinley, chairman of the British Nuclear Test Veterans Association, asking if she will set up a full judicial inquiry into the current health of British service men who took part in nuclear tests between 1952 and 1958; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The Prime Minister has asked me, as the appropriate Defence Minister, to reply to both letters from Mr. McGinley. A reply to his letter of 9 January was sent on 29 January and I have today replied to his letter of 21 April.

EC Budget (United Kingdom Contributions)

Mr. Marlow asked the Prime Minister to what extent under the terms of the Fontainebleau agreement, the United Kingdom abatement of European Economic contributions for the 1985 budget year and beyond is dependent on United Kingdom agreement to supplementary European Economic Community budgets.

Mr. Lawson: I have been asked to reply.

Under the Fontainebleau agreement, the figure for the United Kingdom's abatement in the main Community budget each year is an estimate of our true entitlement, based on preliminary information about our contributions to and receipts from the Community in the previous year. Because the initial provision is an estimate, it has to be corrected in the light of outturn information. Under the agreed methodology, this correction is done through a supplementary budget. The United Kingdom would judge on their own merits any expenditure proposals the Commission chose to include in such a supplementary.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Taxation

Sir Peter Hordern asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much is raised under each schedule of income tax; how much taxpayers pay under each schedule; and if he will indicate how many taxpayers pay under more than one schedule.

Mr. Moore: I regret the delay in providing this answer. The table below gives an analysis by schedule of the income tax receipts expected in 1986-87. It is not possible to provide reliable estimates for a more detailed analysis.

Income Tax Receipts, 1986-87

	£ million
Schedules A, B, and D, net of repayments (including composite rate tax on Bank and Building Society interest)	7,000
Schedule E, net of repayments	35,700
Schedule C (tax deducted from gilts)	2,700
Additional tax on investment income taxed at source	450
Tax on company payments (debenture interest)	450
Other income tax	750
Repayments under the life assurance premium relief at source scheme	−550
Repayments under the MIRAS scheme	−3,950
Other repayments (mainly to tax exempt institutions)	−4,050
Total	38,500

About 20,450,000 single people and married couples are expected to pay income tax in 1986-87. Estimates of those paying under certain schedules are:

Single people and Married Couples

Schedule	thousands
A	350
B	*
C	850
D	†7,600
E	14,100

* less than 1,000.

† including those with both earned and unearned income, but excluding many basic rate taxpayers with small amounts of income under Schedule D with tax deducted at source.

I regret that it is not possible to give reliable estimates of taxpayers under other schedules, nor of those liable under more than one schedule.

Money Supply

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the increase in the broad money supply since May 1979 in cash and in percentage terms; and how he estimates the additional money has been distributed.

Mr. Ian Stewart: From mid May 1979 to mid March 1986, £M3 increased by £69·1 billion, or by 123·0 per cent. (adjusted to take acccount of the revised definition of the monetary sector introduced in 1981).

Figures for £M3 held by various categories of holder are given in Financial Statistics, tables 14.1 to 14.4.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the percentage increase in the supply of broad money in real terms between February 1974 and May 1979 and between May 1979 and the latest available date.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Information on broad money and nominal GDP is available in Economic Trends.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the recent changes in the velocity of money; what effects the changes have had on the economy; and what plans he has for further controls.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I refer the hon. Member to the speech by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the Lombard Association on 16 April, a copy of which has been deposited in the Library of the House.

Exchange Rates

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the increase in the value of the yen and the deutschemark in each quarter since the beginning of 1983, on the basis of 1983=100.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Effective exchange rates for the yen and deutschemark are available in the International Monetary Fund publication, "International Financial Statistics".

Tokyo Summit

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the outcome of the world economic summit in Tokyo.

Mr. MacGregor: The Tokyo economic summit concluded today. It is usual for the Prime Minister to make a statement to the House on the outcome.

European Monetary System

Mr. Deakins asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will ask the EEC Commission to make a report to the Council on the effect of the recent European monetary system realignment on areas of expenditure other than agriculture and on own resources revenue.

Mr. Brooke: The Commission has already been asked to provide details of the overall budgetary effects of the EMS realignment, but have declined so far to provide information on items other than CAP expenditure.

National Insurance

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the effect on Exchequer revenues of removing the half tax relief from class 4 national insurance contributions.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Advertising Agencies

Mr. Clay asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer which advertising agencies have been engaged by his Department for each of the past five years; and what sums each has been paid.

Mr. Brooke: The following advertising agencies have been engaged over the past five years in connection with privatisation:

BP 1983
Cable and Wireless 1983
Britoil 1985
Cable and Wireless 1985
St James's Advertising & Street's Advertising
Street's Financial Advertising
Dewe Rogerson Ltd.
Collett Dickinson, Pearce and Partners Ltd.

It is not the practice to disclose the value of individual contracts between the Government and its advisers.

Excise Duties

Mr. George Gardiner asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the estimated receipts in 1985-86 and 1986-87 from excise duties on spirits, beer, wine, made wine, cider and perry, respectively; and if he will explain any differences or special factors.

Mr. Brooke: The estimates are as follows:

	*1985-86 £ Million	1986-87 £ Million†
Spirits	1,500	1,600
Beer	1,960	2,010
Wine	630	640

Value Added Tax

Mr. Buchan asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what value added tax was due, deductible, and payable, or repayable, in each financial year for which figures are available since 1973-74, in the United Kingdom, on (a) all cultural events, (b) artists and authors, and so on, (c) cinemas, (d) theatres, music halls, radio and television services, films and recording studios, and so on, (e) public libraries, museums and galleries and (f) performers and performing groups.

Mr. Brooke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the number of businesses registered for value added tax at the latest convenient dates within the following turnover bands: £0, £1-£19,500.

£19,500-£49,500, £50,000-£99,000, £100,000-£499,000, £500,000-£1,999,000 and £2,000,000-plus; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 2 May 1986, c. 530]: I regret that it is not possible to provide details for all of the turnover bands requested by my hon. Friend. The information available is as follows:

Turnover (£)	Number of registered businesses (as at 31/12/84)
0	46,100*
1-19,999	215,400

Agriculture (Expenditure Limits)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what limit on (a) overall and (b) agricultural spending has been set by the European Economic Community Council of Ministers for 1987; and how this compares with the equivalent figures for 1986;

(2) if he will estimate (a) overall and (b) agricultural spending by the European Economic Community in 1986; what were the limits on spending set in 1985; what are the implications for the budgetary discipline framework agreed at Fontainebleau; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

EC (Expenditure)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the maximum expenditure of the European Economic Community entailed by the 1·4 per cent. value added tax ceiling and Fontainebleau arrangement; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: In 1986, the maximum expenditure of the EEC entailed by the 1·4 per cent. VAT ceiling and the Fontainebleau arrangement is likely to be about 35 billion ecus (£22·5 billion).

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much of the recent increase in the value added tax contribution to the EEC budget will be taken up by an increase in non-agricultural spending after allowing for the growth of own resources in real terms; and if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the increase in EEC expenditure in real terms each year since 1979 in relation to the increase in United Kingdom Government expenditure.

Mr. Brooke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

EC (Budget)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each year since 1972 the appropriation for the European Economic Community budget and the amount of any supplementary budgets for (a) agriculture, (b) other purposes and (c) the amount actually spent; and if he will provide the estimate for the current year and the forecast for 1987.

Mr. Brooke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Agriculture (Self-employed Persons)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will bring up to date the information on self-employed agricultural incomes and tax given in his answers of 14 March and 26 March 1985, Official Report, columns 157-8.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Farm Incomes

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will bring up to date and publish in the Official Report the table on farm incomes given in his Department's reply dated 9 November 1984 to question 4r of the questionnaire from the Treasury and Civil Service Committee on the economic consequences of United Kingdom membership of the European Economic Community.

Mrs. Fenner: I have been asked to reply.

The table shows the estimated number and total income assessed for tax of all single persons and married couples in the United Kingdom, with an identifiable self-employment income from agriculture and or horticulture by range of total income for 1977-78 to 1983-84. Data are not available prior to 1977-78.

Notes:

* This table covers single persons and married couples with an indentifiable self-employment income from agriculture and/or horticulture regardless of the size of their total income. Agriculture and horticulture is defined according to the 1969 Classification Index for 1977-78—1980-81. The 1981 classification index was employed from 1981-82.

 Indicates number calculated as falling in each income range with married couples counting as one.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the time lag between changes in the exchange rate and changes in the balance of trade in manufactures; what rate of exchange is reflected in trade in manufactures in the first quarter of the current year; what is the cause of the fall in exports; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor [pursuant to his reply, 1 May 1986, c, 478]: There can be no unique estimate of the effect of changes in the exchange rate on the balance of trade in manufactures. It will depend on a whole range of price, wage and output responses in the economy. Changes in the balance of trade in manufactures from quarter to quarter reflect many factors, and cannot be related to a particular exchange rate. The April CBI survey showed an improvement both in optimism with regard to export prospects and in new export orders for the next four months.

Income Tax

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many persons have been taken out of tax following each budget since 1960; and how many persons had become liable for tax each year by the time of the following budget.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 8 April 1986, c. 92]: Information in the form requested is readily available only for Budgets since 1979. The table shows the latest estimates of the numbers of taxpayers in each year and the numbers who would have paid tax if allowances had remained unchanged in the previous budget.

DEFENCE

Plastic Bullets

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many British soldiers have been subjected to internal disciplinary procedures during the period 1970 to 1985, inclusive, as a result of their use of baton rounds in Northern Ireland, indicating the nature of the charge and the outcome of the procedure in each case.

Mr. Lee: Records are not maintained in a form which would enable the information requested to be provided without disproportionate effort.

US Military Facilities

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will list the bilateral agreements between the United Kingdom and the United States of America regarding the presence of United States military facilities.

Mr. Stanley: I shall write to the hon. Lady.

Advertising Agencies

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Defence which advertising agencies have been engaged by his Department for each of the past five years; and what sums each have been paid.

Mr. John Lee: I shall answer shortly.

Nuclear Weapons-Related Activities (Scotland)

Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the number of jobs in Scotland dependent on nuclear weapons-related activities; and how many are in the west of Scotland and the east of Scotland, respectively.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall write to my hon. Friend on this subject as soon as possible.

Royal Marines, Arbroath and Locking

Mr. Wiggin asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has any plans to base additional units at the Royal Marines base, Condor, Arbroath, or at Royal Air Force Locking; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: We have recently agreed in principle to make part of the Royal Marines base Condor at Arbroath and RAF Locking available to the United States' Navy for use as a peacetime storage facility and as a hospital which would be activated in the event of war.

Nuclear Stockpiles, Europe

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence which improvement measures are being undertaken by the United Kingdom to implement the Montebello decision of October 1985 on land-based nuclear stockpiles in Europe following on from the nuclear planning group.

Mr. Stanley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) on 28 April, at column 331.

Exercise Elder Forest

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the recent North Atlantic Treaty Organisation exercise Elder Forest.

Mr. Stanley: Elder Forest is the name of a routine NATO exercise which takes place every other year and is designed to test the United Kingdom air defences. This year's exercise was held between 21-24 April and aircraft of nine NATO countries, including France, took part. Planning for the exercise commenced in mid-1985 and it was unconnected with the recent USAF operation against terrorist targets in Libya.

Universities

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence what formal links exist between universities and his Department, other than the awarding of research contracts.

Mr. Norman Lamont: We have joined the research councils in making available joint research grants for work of high scientific merit and relevance to defence in the academic sector.

The Ministry of Defence has other links with the research councils at various levels, and the Chief Scientific Adviser is a member of the Advisory Board for the Research Councils.

Work is in hand to achieve greater collaboration with the academic sector in the provision and use of research facilities and there is to be a meeting held annually under ABRC auspices to review the MOD's and the research councils' capital investment plans: the inaugural meeting was held on 20 March 1986.

The Ministry of Defence has a sponsorship scheme to assist students wishing to study engineering and science at university. It also sponsors defence lectureships at several universities.

There are finally various arrangements between individual MOD research establishments and institutions of higher education with a mutual interest of particular lines of research.

Research Contracts

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list Ministry of Defence research contracts currently placed with British universities and other educational establishments.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The Ministry of Defence has currently 757 research agreements and a small number of contracts with British universities and other institutions of higher education at an annual cost of some £10 million a year, which is planned to increase. It would involve disproportionate effort to list each research agreement, but if the hon. Gentleman has any specific area of interest, I will see what can be done to help him.

Libya

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Defence if, on Friday 11 April, he had in his possession information which clearly set out the differences between the equipment carried by airplanes based on aircraft carriers of the United States Navy and F111 aircraft based in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Stanley: As the President of the United States made clear, F111 aircraft operating from bases in the United Kingdom were essential for the United States action against Libya, because of their special characteristics which would provide the safest means of achieving the particular objectives with the lowest possible risk of Libyan civilian and United States service casualties. This stemmed from their advanced avionics and precision strike capabilities. The detailed arrangements for the operation were a matter for the United States within the strict criteria set by Her Majesty's Government, that action should be against specific targets demonstrably involved in the conduct and support of terrorist activities. My right hon. Friend has, of course, long been generally aware of the capabilities of these types of United States aircraft.

Nuclear Tests

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Ynys Môn on 18 November 1985, Official Report, column 212, why it is not regarded as in the national interest to identify the purpose of each nuclear test undertaken for the United Kingdom nuclear weapons programme.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 10 March 1986 at column 369.

NATO (Defence Planning Committee)

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the role of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation's defence planning committee; and what subjects it is currently considering.

Mr. Stanley: NATO's Defence Planning Committee is the co-ordinating and decision making body for all questions concerning the integrated military structure. It meets regularly at ambassadorial level, and twice a year at ministerial level, to consider a range of allied defence planning issues. Further information on the role of the Defence Planning Committee is contained in "The North Atlantic Treaty Organisation: Facts and figures", a copy of which is in the Library. A summary of the main issues discussed is given in the communiqué issued after each Ministerial meeting of the Defence Planning Committee, copies of which are in the Library.

Assault Ships

Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the design study for the assault ships to replace HMS Fearless and HMS Intrepid.

Mr. Lee: I have nothing to add to my answer of 11 February at column 772.

Hospitality

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Defence how much was spent by his Department on official hospitality in the financial years 1983-84, 1984-85 and 1985-86.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The information requested is as follows:

1983-84	2,298,507
1984-85	2,620,809
1985-86	2,803,890

The amounts quoted represent total expenditure borne on defence votes for the provision of official entertainment. They therefore include expenditure incurred not only by the Ministry of Defence itself, but also by formations and establishments of the armed forces at home and abroad and by individual officers occupying command and international appointments for which entertainment allowances are payable.

Armed United States Personnel

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Defence what authority is required by United States service personnel to carry weapons in the United Kingdom; what authority has been given to United States personnel to carry weapons on streets in central London; what representations he has received about this matter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement regarding the presence of armed United States marines from the United States Embassy on the streets of London on the morning of 24 April.

Mr. Stanley [pursuant to his reply, 29 April 1986, c. 375]: It is not a contravention of United Kingdom law for United States service men to carry arms in the United Kingdom, if they do so on duty authorised by their superiors. This arises by virtue of an extension of the provision in the firearms legislation exempting United Kingdom service men from its provisions, which has been applied to visiting forces by means of an order made in 1965 under section 8 of the Visiting Forces Act 1952. The authorisation for the United States service men will be a matter for their service superiors. Article VII paragraph 10 of the NATO status of forces agreement imposes certain restrictions on those areas where they can carry arms. I understand from the United States authorities that no armed United States service men were deployed from their normal posts in the vicinity of the Oxford street bombing on 24 April.

I have also replied to a question on this matter from the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) on 28 April at column 333.

ENERGY

Advertising Agencies

Mr. Clay Asked the Secretary of State for Energy which advertising agencies have been engaged by his Department for each of the past five years; and what sums each has been paid.

Mr. Peter Walker: Advertising expenditure by my Department by agency in each of the last five years was:

Year and Advertising Agency	Amount spent with Agency £
1981-82
Young and Rubicam	3,240,000
Charles Barker	16,500
1982-83
Young and Rubicam	1,160,000
Charles Barker	20,600
1983-84
Young and Rubicam	1,630,000
Charles Barker	31,400
1984-85
Young and Rubicam	1,660,000
Doyle Dane Bernbach	2,567,000
Charles Barker	57,000
1985-86
Doyle Dane Bernbach	8,987
Saatchi and Saatchi	4,182,000
Charles Barker	121,000

Oil Prices

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has quantified the effect of the drop in the oil price on employment in oil related industries (a) offshore on the United Kingdom continental shelf and (b) onshore in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: It is too early to be able to quantify the effect of the drop in oil prices on employment in the industry. A substantial proportion of oil related employment is committed to the support of fields already in production. The oil price is still well above the average cost of production in the United Kingdom and on the United Kingdom continental shelf. So far as employment related to exploration and development is concerned, the stable political and fiscal regime here continues to attract the oil industry. Already this year I have approved three oil projects, four gas projects and a pipeline. The oil industry is naturally reviewing its plans, but it is its perception of prices in the 1990s and beyond, rather than current levels, which will determine longer-term investment decisions.

European Demonstration Reprocessing Plant

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether the safeguards arrangements to apply to the proposed European demonstration reprocessing plant at Dounreay contain any provisions for the withdrawal of nuclear materials from safeguards for national security reasons.

Mr. Goodlad: As a civil nuclear facility the proposed European demonstration reprocessing plant at Dounreay would be subject to Euratom safeguards inspections and th provisions of the UK-IAEA-Euratom safeguards agreement.

Article 14 of the agreement provides for the withdrawal of nuclear material for national security reasons. However, in reply to a question from the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) on 23 December 1982, at column 668, my right hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, Central (Mr.

Moore) said that the Government have no plans for putting to military use any plutonium derived from the United Kingdom civil nuclear programme. The fast reactor programme at Dounreay is part of the civil nuclear programme.

Plutonium

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether any plutonium exported for civil purposes from the United Kingdom has ever been subsequently re-transferred to a different state with the prior knowledge and consent of the United Kingdom Government.

Mr. Goodlad: Yes. In each instance where permission for re-transfer was granted, the new recipient of the material gave assurances on peaceful end use and the application of international safeguards.

Public Bodies (Official Secrets Act)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many staff members of the (a) Central Electricity Generating Board, (b) South of Scotland Electricity Board, (c) United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority, (d) National Nuclear Corporation and (e) British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. are respectively, required to sign the Official Secrets Act.

Mr. Goodlad: The provisions of the Official Secrets Acts apply to all those who have access to official information. It is a matter for the organisation concerned to decide whether to draw this fact to the attention of its staff by requiring them to sign a formal declaration. This information is not held centrally and could not be obtained without considerable difficulty.

Nuclear Safeguards, Sellafield

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects an agreement to be reached between Her Majesty's Government and the European Commissioner over article 36 of Commission resolution 3227/76 concerning the application of nuclear safeguards to the Magnox spent fuel material balance area at Sellafield.

Mr. Goodlad: I expect to make an announcement shortly.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy why Her Majesty's Government instructed British Nuclear Fuels plc's safeguards staff not to answer detailed questions on safeguards during the official visit to Sellafield on 17 March by members of the European Parliament, Messrs. Llewellyn, Smith and Amédée Turner.

Mr. Peter Walker: No instructions were given by my Department that BNFL should not answer questions by Members of the European Parliament. However, the Department and BNFL agreed that it would not be appropriate for the company to answer questions on the detail of the discussions which have been taking place between Euratom and the United Kingdom, as these are confidential.

Nuclear Safeguards (Thurso Inquiry)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether it was on his instructions that the witness from his Department at the European demonstration reprocessing plant public inquiry at Thurso refused to answer detailed questions on the application of nuclear safeguards to facilities and nuclear materials under cross-examination on 8 April.

Mr. Goodlad: The witness representing my Department answered all questions put to him which the inquiry reporter ruled were relevant to the inquiry.

TRANSPORT

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many leakages of radiation have occurred since 1979 in the transport of nuclear waste to the disposal site.

Mr. Ridley: None.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many accidents involving pollution have occurred since 1979 during the transfer of Japanese spent fuel via Barrow and Immingham; if his Department has been monitoring pollution as a result of transporting foreign radioactive material through the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: There have been no accidents involving escape of radioactivity during the transport of spent fuel. The only accidental radioactivity recorded since 1979 was transported by the wind last week from Chernobyl. Monitoring of fuel consignments from Japan is carried out during each voyage, on arrival in the United Kingdom and on receipt at Sellafield. Any abnormal condition is reported to my Department.

Lorry Drivers (Hours)

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the objections registered by the United Kingdom road transport unions against the introduction of the new European Economic Community regulations relating to lorry drivers' hours and rest periods at the meeting of 30 April; what were his replies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: When my hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for roads and traffic met officials of the Transport and General Workers Union on 30 April they expressed their concern that the greater flexibility incorporated in the new regulations, and the proposals to amend the provisions of the Transport Act 1968, would make enforcement more difficult and might lead to increased driver fatigue. My hon. Friend pointed out that the regulations provide for less driving time, longer rest and break periods, and greater scope for drivers to arrange their work schedules to suit their own needs.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. David Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Transport for what reason, and on what basis, a document has been drawn up by his Department purporting to lay out a timetable for the consideration by the House of the Channel Tunnel Bill; what criteria were used and what assumptions made in the choice of dates contained in the document, with particular reference to the duration of the proceedings of any Select Committee to which the Bill may be committed; to whom this document has been issued; if he will place a copy in the Library; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The document referred to is entitled "Channel Tunnel Bill: Possible Timetable". It was prepared as an internal working document for planning purposes on the basis outlined in the Channel fixed link White Paper (Cmnd. 9735) that the Bill would be introduced in the spring with the aim of obtaining Royal Assent in the early summer of 1987. The dates included in the document are guesses. The actual timetable will, of course, be determined by Parliament. The document was made available to assist the Kent Channel Tunnel Joint Consultative Committee in planning its work. I am placing a copy in the Library.

Motorways (Lighting)

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Transport what further consideration has been given to lighting those parts of the M1 and M6 motorways at present unlit.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The night time accident rate on all motorways is kept under review and lighting is considered whenever a serious accident problem develops. Lighting is being installed at present on the M1 in Northamptonshire south of junction 16 to south of junction 15 and work will commence on the section north from Newport Pagnell service area to south of junction 15 later this year. The installation of lighting on the M6 between junction 29 and 32 is currently being considered.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport what further consideration has been given to lighting those parts of the motorways at present unlit in the north-west region.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Detailed examination is currently being given to the provision of lighting on the M6 between junctions 29 and 32 at Preston. The situation in the region is constantly monitored.

Helicopter Rescue Service

Mr. Viggers asked the Secretary of State for Transport what were the conclusions of the search and rescue services committee which met on 29 April regarding the helicopter rescue service operated from HMS Daedalus at Lee-on-Solent.

Mr. Ridley: The United Kingdom search and rescue committee concluded that a strong operational case exists for maintaining a helicopter capabiliy to operate from a location in the Solent area for civil search and rescue.

National Bus Company

Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for Transport how he proposes to meet the cost of urgent bills for expenses of the sale of National Bus Company operations.

Mr. Ridley: Parliamentary approval for this expenditure has been sought in the Main Supply Estimates (Class VIII, Vote 8). Pending that approval, urgent expenditure estimates at £300,000, will be met by repayable advances from the Contingencies Fund.

British Airports Authority

Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for Transport how he proposes to meet the cost of urgent bills for preliminary expenses of the sale of shares in the British Airports Authority.

Mr. Ridley: Parliamentary approval of this expenditure has been sought in the Main Supply Estimates (Class VIII, Vote 7). Pending approval of the Estimate, urgent expenditure estimated at £350,000 will be met by repayable advances from the Contingencies Fund.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Baton Rounds

Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many plastic bullets were fired by the Royal Ulster Constabulary in 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985, respectively.

Mr. Scott: Separate records of the number of plastic baton rounds fired by the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the Army were not maintained until 1 March 1981. From that date the annual figures for the Royal Ulster Constabulary are as follows:

	Number
1981*	19,649
1982	335
1983	545
1984	1,503
1985	906

* from 1 March

European Regional Development Fund

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much of the £9·5 million, approximately, which will become available from the new European regional development fund special measure for the border areas, will be made available to each of the qualifying district council areas in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Boyson: A programme for the implementation of the measure is being prepared by the Department of Economic Development for submission to the European Commission for its approval. This programme will include projects suggested by district councils, which will participate in their implementation. The Department will seek to ensure that each of the 25 eligible councils is given an oppportunity to participate.

Benefits

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make it his policy to gather information on the number of suspected (a) Republican and (b) other members of paramilitary organisations in receipt of unemployment and other social benefits.

Mr. Needham [pursuant to his reply, 1 May 1986, c. 466]: No. Information obtained from claimants to unemployment benefit and other social security benefits is restricted to that necessary to enable the Department of Health and Social Services to consider entitlement to the benefit claimed.

Anglo-Irish Agreement

Mr. A. Cecil Walker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which version of the Anglo-Irish agreement was lodged with the United Nations.

Mr. Eggar: I have been asked to reply.

Both the United Kingdom and the Republic of Ireland texts of the Anglo-Irish agreement were registered at the United Nations on 20 December 1985.

WALES

Joint Care Funding

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much money is allocated by his Department this year for joint care funding; and how this compares with expenditure over each of the past three years.

Mr. Mark Robinson: I shall make an announcement about the level of funds available shortly.

University Hospital of Wales

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary for Wales how many patients are to be sent home from the University Hospital of Wales, Cardiff, as a result of recent money-saving proposals.

Mr. Mark Robinson: No proposals have been implemented by South Glamorgan health authority at the University Hospital of Wales which have affected patient attendances.

Bovine Tuberculosis

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary for Wales if he will publish figures showing the incidence of bovine tuberculosis in each of the Welsh counties for each year since 1981; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The number of new herds with bovine tuberculosis in each Welsh county for each year from 1981 to 1985 is shown in the table.

County	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985

Farmer's Lung

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary for Wales if he will publish figures showing how many cases of farmer's lung were reported in east Dyfed during 1985-86; and if he will publish the corresponding figures for each year since 1981.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The information is not available centrally in the form requested. The following table shows, for each of the years 1982 to 1985, the numbers of discharges of cases treated for farmer's lung at hospitals in east Dyfed.

Number of discharges

	Numbers
1982	10
1983	5
1984	2
1985	*7

* Provisional.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will initiate measures to enhance the specialist medical care for sufferers of farmer's lung by establishing a regional centre for such care in each part of Wales.

Mr. Mark Robinson: Responsibility for the provision of facilities for the treatment of respiratory diseases, including farmer's lung, other than those requiring the special care of the regional service provision in respect of radiotherapy and thoracic surgery, lies with the district health authorities. We do not propose to initiate any changes, since the Department has not received any requests from the health authorities for the redesignation of the service offered to people suffering from farmer's lung.

School Mergers

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what guidelines his Department offers to local education authorities in the event of mergers of bilingual schools with English-medium schools.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Guidance on Welsh-medium provision is offered in "Welsh in Schools" published in 1981. Welsh Office circular 26/80 states that a change in the linguistic character of a maintained school would generally be regarded as significant. Where such a change was contemplated it would require publication of proposals under section 12 of the Education Act 1980 (section 13 in the case of a voluntary school).

Welsh Water Authority

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether the privatisation of the Welsh water authority will affect charges made for bulk supplies to other water undertakings.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The Water Services plc's will be free to negotiate for bulk supplies at a commercial rate. While having regard to the general principle that charges should be cost related and should not be discriminatory, undertakers who are unable to agree terms will have the right to appeal to the Director General of Water Services; and in determining such appeals the Director General will take account of all relevant factors. The Government would expect the Director General to allow Welsh Water, like any other exporting water company, to earn a reasonable profit from the sale of bulk supplies. Equally, the Director General would be expected to ensure that monopoly situations will not be abused.

Rates

Mr. Terlezki asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will introduce legislation to exempt residential homes for elderly people from liability to rates; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: I have been asked to reply.

Many residential homes for the elderly already receive full or partial relief from rates under the Rating (Disabled Persons) Act 1978. The Government have no plans to legislate in this area pending the introduction of the changes in local taxation set out in the recent Green Paper "Paying for Local Government" (Cmnd. 9714).

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Paymaster General whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each European Economic Community country the percentage rate of unemployment in May 1979 and at the latest available date in each case, the numbers employed in manufacturing and the number of full-time adult male workers.

Mr. Lang: The available information on unemployment rates is given in the following table. The figures are based on national definitions and are not fully comparable.

With respect to the numbers employed in manufacturing, I refer the hon. Member to my answer on 24 April, at column 204.

Information on the number of full-time male workers in European Community countries is available from the annual labour force sample surveys, the results of which are published by the Statistical Office of the European Communities. It is to be found on page 32 of the publication containing the 1979 results, and page 92 of the one containing those for 1983, copies of both of which are available in the Library.

Mr. Park asked the Paymaster General how many people were employed in 1980 in Coventry in the manufacture of machine tools; and how many were employed in the last 12 months.

Mr. Lang: Employment statistics for local areas are available only for those dates when censuses of employment are taken. No census was taken in 1980, but in 1981, the latest date for which figures are available, there were 3,800 employees employed in the Coventry jobcentre area in the manufacture of metal-working machine tools (activity heading 3221 of the Standard Industrial Classification 1980).

More up-to-date employment estimates for local areas will become available following publication of the 1984 census of employment later this year. Between censuses, employment estimates are based on small-scale sample inquiries which cannot produce reliable results for areas smaller than regions.

Mr. Park asked the Paymaster General what has been the rise in the rate of unemployment in the Coventry, North-East constituency in the last 18 months; and what is the level of unfilled vacancies.

Mr. Lang: The following information is in the Library. Unemployment rates are not calculated for areas smaller than travel-to-work areas. However, on 13 September 1984 there were 9,180 unemployed claimants in the Coventry, North-East constituency. The corresponding number for 6 March 1986 was 8,559, a fall over the last 18 months of 621. Comparisons over the period are affected by seasonal factors and the change in the basis of the count in March 1986. Information on the number of unfilled vacancies in the Coventry, North-East constituency is not available. However, on 7 March 1986 there were 692 unfilled vacancies at the Coventry jobcentre and 39 unfilled vacancies at the Coventry careers office.

Mr. Park asked the Paymaster General what percentage of economically active women between the ages of 16 and 60 years are in work, full-time and part-time, in the Coventry, North-East constituency.

Mr. Lang: The available information comes from the 1981 census of population and is contained in "Parliamentary Constituency Monitor" reference CEN 81 PCM 22, published on 19 May 1983, a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Clay asked the Paymaster General how many of the vacancies registered at jobcentres at the latest available date were for part-time employment.

Mr. Lang: On 7 March 1986 there were 45,229 unfilled vacancies at jobcentres in Great Britain which involved work for less than 30 hours per week, out of a total of 158,263.

Restart Scheme

Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General what consultation took place with the training providers prior to launching the restart scheme.

Mr. Lang: Restart courses were piloted earlier this year in nine areas by 30 providers who were consulted in the design of the revised course for the national restart programme.

Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General what additional funds have been made available to training providers in order that they can meet the extra demand for training stimulated by the restart scheme and the action for jobs campaign.

Mr. Lang: An additional £50 million has been made available to the Manpower Services Commission in 1986-87 to enable the commission to fund short training courses through local training providers.

Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General what percentage of funds for training under the restart scheme is targeted to meeting the needs of the unemployed ethnic minorities.

Mr. Lang: Since all registered long-term unemployed people will be eligible for the new restart courses, ethnic minorities will benefit. No specific additional funds have been made available for ethnic minorities under the restart programme.

Scottish Gospel Outreach

Mr. Martin asked the Paymaster General how much has been paid to Scottish Gospel Outreach by the Manpower Services Commission for employment projects in respect of (a) use of premises and facilities and (b) telephone and other administrative costs.

Mr. Lang: Scottish Gospel Outreach has two community programme projects funded by the Manpower Services Commission. The Manpower Services Commission has made no payments for use of premises and since April 1985 has paid respectively £1,079·55 and £1,136·00 to each project in respect of administration and other overheads costs including telephone.

Mr. Martin asked the Paymaster General if he will list the names of the supervisors of the employment projects run by Scottish Gospel Outreach on behalf of the Manpower Services Commission.

Mr. Lang: The Scottish Gospel Outreach sponsors two community programme projects, the Helping Hands project and the Dennistoun Lunch Club project. Each of these projects has a supervisor. I shall write to the hon. Member separately on this matter.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

GATT

91. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent discussions have been held in the European Economic Community Foreign Affairs Council concerning the general agreement on tariffs and trade negotiations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply I gave on 9 April to the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk). Discussions are expected at both this month's and next month's meetings of the EC Foreign Affairs Council.

Exports (United States Controls)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will estimate the cost to United Kingdom industry of the new United States export control régime in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: It is not possible to estimate the cost of complying with the new United States distribution licence regulations, which depends on how often, if at all, United Kingdom companies comply. Such compliance is unlikely unless United Kingdom companies see commercial justification for doing so.

Food Imports

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing such information as is available to him for Spain and Portugal relating to the average price paid for basic foodstuffs imported from (a) the United States of America and (b) the European Economic Community in 1985 compared with the price paid for United Kingdom imports from the European Economic Community.

Mr. Alan Clark: The available information is in the table. These countries import different types of food both in total and from each of the sources. Given the wide range of foodstuffs prices, averages of differing mixtures are likely to show substantial differences.

Trade Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the European Economic Community percentage share of the United Kingdom market in 1975, the second quarter of 1979 and the latest available quarter in the case of man-made fibres, agricultural machinery, cotton textiles, motor vehicles, engineering, wool textiles, carpets, motor cars, chemicals and textiles generally.

Mr. Alan Clark: Estimates of the European Community import share of the United Kingdom market in 1975, 1979 and 1984 for the industrial sectors required are given in the table. This information is not readily available on a quarterly basis.

Timber

Mr. Lyell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total value of imports of timber to the United Kingdom for each of the past five years;

(2) what proportion of the total timber imported into the United Kingdom over the past five years is of a type which is grown commercially in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark : Information on the value of timber imports is as follows:

Over the past five years about 70 per cent. of timber imported into the United Kingdom has been of a type that could be grown commercially in the United Kingdom.

Regional Assistance

Mr. Sackville asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the expenditure on regional development grant and regional selective assistance in each region of England, Scotland and Wales for each financial year from 1981-82 to 1985-86.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The information requested is given by economic planning regions in the following tables:

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Official Development Assistance

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the amount of net official development assistance provided by Britain to developing countries in 1985 as a percentage of gross national product.

Mr. Raison: Provisional figures indicate that in 1985 Britain provided net official development assistance equivalent to 0·33 per cent. of GNP.

Gibraltar

84. Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further financial aid has been granted, or is proposed to be granted, to the dependent territory of Gibraltar in the present financial year; and for what purpose this aid is to be provided.

Mr. Raison: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South (Mr. Bright) on 16 April at column 394.

South Africa

85. Ms. Clare Short asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what matters were discussed when his chief education adviser visited South Africa last month.

Mr. Raison: The Overseas Development Administration's chief education adviser had discussions with non-governmental organisations in South Africa about the provision of scholarships and other assistance for disadvantaged South Africans.

SCOTLAND

Mental Patients

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many patients have been discharged from mental illness hospitals in Scotland in each of the past six years, broken down by length of stay, age and sex.

Mr. John MacKay: The information is as follows:

Parole

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many long-term prisoners in Scotland have been eligible for parole under the 1984 revised guidelines; how many have chosen not to be considered; how many cases have been referred to the Parole Board for information only; and how many cases the Parole Board subsequently recommended for release following original rejection by the local review committee.

Mr. John MacKay: In 1984, the Parole Board for Scotland considered 55 cases of those serving sentences of over five years for crimes of violence or drug trafficking to which the new policy applied. Of this number, 37 cases were referred to the Board for information only and in 21 of these cases release had not been recommended by a local review committee. The board did not recommend release in any of the cases referred for information only and not recommended for release by a local review committee.

In 1984 out of a total of 819 inmates who were eligible for consideration for parole 100 opted out of the scheme. Separate figures for those who opted out, and were subject to the new parole policy, are not available.

Figures for cases considered for parole in 1985 are not yet available.

Life Sentences

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total number of individuals in Scotland sentenced to life imprisonment between 1965 and 1985, other than for the crime of murder; and for what crimes the sentence was imposed.

Mr. John MacKay: I regret that this information is not maintained in the form requested. I understand, however, that among persons currently in custody the crimes other than murder to which an indeterminate sentence was imposed between 1965 and 1985 include attempted murder (three cases), culpable homicide (five cases), robbery (one case), rape (one case), incest (one case) and wilful fire raising (one case).

Sentences (High Court)

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the number of minimum recommended sentences imposed by the High Court in Scotland for each year from 1965 to 1985; and what recommendations were made.

Mr. John MacKay: I regret that this information is not maintained in the form requested. Accordingly, the available information which follows may not be comprehensive.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Millan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the cumulative reduction in rate support grant since 1978-79 in Scotland at 1986-87 prices, showing figures for each of the years 1979-80 to 1986-87.

Mr. Rifkind: The figures below show for each year the difference between rate support grant in 1978-79 and rate support grant in the year in question on a constant price basis. The GDP deflator is used to convert from cash to constant prices. The rate support grant figures are those in the report on the latest Rate Support Grant (Scotland) Order for the year in question.

Travelling People (Sites)

Mr. Millan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether any grants are payable by him to persons and bodies other than local authorities in connection with the provision of sites for travelling people; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: Provision of sites for travelling people is a local authority responsibility. I have no power to provide financial assistance specifically towards the costs of providing such sites to any other person or body.

The Government recently announced a target date of December 1988 for completion of a network of sites sufficient to meet the needs of Scotland's travelling community. I am convinced that this is the right policy to secure satisfactory provision for travellers and to remove for the settled community the nuisance of unauthorised encampments.

Standard Grade Courses (Assessment)

Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has received the report of the sub-group of the joint working parties' steering committee which was set up last September to review assessment in standard grade courses.

Mr. Rifkind: The sub-group's report has been presented to me after the approval of the joint working parties steering committee. The report confirms the Government's belief that standard grade can without fundamental change lead to more relevant and effective teaching for all pupils.

The report clarifies the role to be played by teachers in assessment of standard grade courses and advises that for the most part internal assessment in day-to-day teaching may be carried out informally, using professional judgment and familiar techniques. As far as assessment for certification is concerned, the report recommends useful simplification of the present arrangements while leaving their basic structure intact, in accordance with the sub-group's remit which, inter alia, required it to have regard to the fundamental principles which underlie standard grade assessment.

I congratulate the sub-group on its work. Subject to the outcome of consultations, I am sure that its proposals when implemented will lead to a substantial easing of the burden which many teachers have feared will arise from the standard grade assessment arrangements.

I have today placed copies of the report, and a leaflet summarising its arguments and conclusions, in the Libraries of both Houses. I have also authorised its circulation for consultation to a wide range of bodies representing educational interests and users of the Scottish Certificate of Education. Comments have been invited by 31 July 1986 and the Government hope that the report's recommendations will be implemented in time for the 1988 diet of examinations.

Assisted Places Scheme

Mrs. McCurley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has decided the amount of fee remission grant to allocate to schools participating in the assisted places scheme in respect of session 1986-87.

Mr. Rifkind: The allocations of fee remission grant for 1986-87 are shown in the table. Forty-one schools will participate, one fewer than in 1985-86 because of the proposed closure of St Margaret's convent school, Edinburgh.

ENERGY

Renewable Energy Sources

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Energy what initiatives the Government are undertaking and what research they are sponsoring into renewable sources of energy supply.

Mr. David Hunt: The Government have identified the most promising renewable energy technologies for exploitation in the United Kingdom, and substantial support is being given to their development through my Department's research, development and demonstration programmes. A detailed account of the content of these programmes and the prospects for the exploitation of renewable energy sources in the United Kingdom, is given in ETSU publications R28, R30 and N3/85. Copies of these documents are in the Libraries of both Houses. The Government seek international collaboration in this area whenever it is of benefit to the United Kingdom.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Evans asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) if he has made any estimates of the potential savings to the United Kingdom's energy bill which will be gained during Energy Efficiency Year in each region of the United Kingdom;

(2) if he will list the total proposed savings during Energy Efficiency Year by sector; and, in each case, what these savings represent as a percentage of (a) total savings in the United Kingdom and (b) the United Kingdom's annual energy bill.

Mr. David Hunt: Energy Efficiency Year is part of a continuing campaign by Government to persuade the nation to save the £7 billion it wastes each year by using energy inefficiently. Savings stimulated by the campaign will accrue over different timescales, depending on the measures undertaken. I regret that there is no satisfactory regional breakdown of total energy consumption. The sectoral breakdown of the nation's energy bill is as follows:

Energy consumption by sector-£ million

	1984
Domestic	9,620
Industry, commerce and public services	11,980
Transport	15,040

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what percentage of imported spent oxide fuel has been kept in the United Kingdom without having been reprocessed since 1979;

(2) what has been the tonnage of spent oxide fuel imported from overseas since 1979.

Mr. Goodlad: From 1 January 1979 to 31 December 1985 approximately, 1,230 teu of spent oxide fuel was imported from overseas. Of this about 14 tonnes were temporarily held in the United Kingdom while in transit to other countries. The balance is stored at Sellafield pending reprocessing in the thermal oxide reprocessing plant which is presently under construction.

Since 1976 BNFL's contracts for the reprocessing of overseas spent fuel have contained options for the return of wastes. As I said in my answer to the hon. Member on 2 May at columns 502-503, the Government intend that the options should be exercised and that the wastes should be returned.

Nuclear Power Industry

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for Energy what benefits he expects to follow for Britain's nuclear industry from his recent visit to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Peter Walker: It is too early to say what benefits might flow from my visit, but I noted strong interest in British expertise in the handling and reprocessing of nuclear waste. Any trade in nuclear materials and technology will, of course, be subject to our international obligations in this area.

PRIME MINISTER

Japan (Visit)

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on her recent visit to Japan.

Mr. Biffen: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend hopes to make a statement to the House about the economic summit in Tokyo.

United States Aircraft (Military Operations)

Mr. Onslow asked the Prime Minister whether there are any circumstances in which United States aircraft based in the United Kingdom can be used in military operations without the consent of Her Majesty's Government; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to the answer, 6 May 1986, c. 3].: Under the Churchill—Truman arrangements, there are no circumstances in which American aircraft based in this country may be used without our consent in military operations planned by the United States.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Building Societies Bill

Mr. Cash asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has had on the Building Societies Bill; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Government have received a number of further representations from societies and others, particularly concerning conversion to company status, obstructed mergers and the provision of pensions.

Conversion to Company Status

The transfer of a society's business to a company will be subject to certain minimum statutory requirements and to confirmation by the Building Societies Commission that the requisite procedures have been complied with. These requirements will ensure that the rights of members are fully safeguarded on conversion, that it is only undertaken with the active participation and support of members, and that the process will not cause unacceptable discontinuity in the institution concerned.

Transfer of its business to a new company created by the society for the purpose will require the approval of a special resolution on which 20 per cent. of eligible members had voted.

The interests of former members of the society will be protected by a right to a priority distribution in the event of liquidation of the new company, reflecting their notional interest in the reserves of the society, to the extent that they had retained a corresponding deposit in the company. Members of the society of at least two years' standing may be entitled to priority in any share issue and to a bonus issue after a further two years. Only in the case of members ineligible to vote on the proposal, by virtue of the small value of their shares or for other reasons, could cash distributions be made reflecting their notional interest in the reserves.

Individual shareholdings in the new company will be limited to 15 per cent. of the total for the first five years. The only exception to this would be for a transfer to an existing company, where the restrictions on cash distributions and the ownership of shares would not apply. But transfer to an existing company would need to be approved by 50 per cent. of members eligible to vote on the special resolution, or by the holders of 90 per cent. of the shares.

Mergers

After further consideration of the representations received on the proposals in part II of schedule 13 to the Bill, under which the board of one society may circulate proposals for a merger to the members of another without the agreement of its board, I have decided to substitute simplified provisions. These would require a society to include in the notice of annual general meetings, or special meetings convened to consider merger proposals, a statement of any merger approach received from another society, unless it had expressly requested that the fact of the approach be kept confidential. Whether to take the matter forward from that point would be for the members using the normal procedures available to them under the rules of the society and the constitutional arrangements provided in the Bill. Detailed amendments are being tabled today.

Provision of pensions

I have also considered further, in consultation with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services, the terms on which building societies should be able to make arrangements for the provision of pensions. I have concluded that building societies should be given a power to invest in a subsidiary or associated company established for the sole purpose of making provision for pensions on a money purchase basis. The subsidiary or associate would need to operate as a unit trust authorised under the financial services legislation.

Financial Services Bill

Mr. Cash asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how the provisions of the Financial Services Bill will affect the Bank of England's surveillance of the wholesale money and foreign exchange markets.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The Government have been considering the arrangements for supervision of the wholesale money, foreign exchange and gold bullion markets. These markets have by tradition generally been overseen and supervised by the Bank of England, on a non-statutory basis. The main participants are recognised banks and deposit-taking institutions, building societies, and specialised brokers and dealers.

Certain transactions in these wholesale markets, such as dealings with brokers in certificates of deposit and dealings in currency and gold options and futures, fall within the scope of the Financial Services Bill as at present drafted. Others, such as dealings in commercial bills, and normal spot and forward currency transactions, are excluded. We have concluded that the supervision of each of these wholesale markets should in future be the responsibility of the Bank of England. This supervision will continue to be on a non-statutory basis. The Government will be issuing a consultative document later this year seeking views on the arrangements for future regulations of these markets.

To reduce supervisory overlap, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will be bringing forward amendments to the Financial Services Bill which will exclude from the definition of carrying on investment business wholesale transactions in these markets if at least one party to the transaction is a recognised bank, licensed deposit taker, building society or an institution on a list to be drawn up by the Bank of England. The bank's criteria for inclusion on such lists and its arrangements for maintaining them will be subject to the approval of the Treasury. The Department of Trade and Industry will be consulting on detailed amendments. A copy of its letter to interested parties is being placed in the Library of the House.

Value Added Tax

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the percentage increase in value added tax thresholds for every year since 1973; what was the percentage annual increase in the rate of inflation for each year since 1973; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The percentage increases in the value added tax registration threshold have been as follows:

Date of Change	Increase in the threshold (per cent.)
1 October 1977	50·0
12 April 1978	33·3
27 March 1980	35·0
11 March 1981	11·1
10 March 1982	13·3
16 March 1983	5·9
14 March 1984	3·9
20 March 1985	4·3
19 March 1986	5·1

The cumulative rate of inflation between April 1973 and December 1985 is 311 per cent. The threshold, increases in which are conventionally rounded to the nearest £100, has risen by 310 per cent. in the same period (from £5,000 in 1973 to £20,500 in the March 1986 Budget). Under the EC sixth VAT directive member states are permitted to increase their threshold by no more than the rate of inflation.

Inflation is normally measured on a 12-months basis, but since April 1973 there have been technical adjustments to the basis of calculation for VAT threshold purposes in order to arrive at the present December-December year-on-year RPI comparison and it is not therefore particularly meaningful to disaggregate the inflation figure to individual years. I shall, however, write to my hon. Friend with further information.

Mr. Buchan asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what value added tax was due, deductible, and payable, or repayable, in each financial year for which figures are available since 1973-74, in the United Kingdom, on (a) all cultural events, (b) artists and authors, and so on, (c) cinemas, (d) theatres, music halls, radio and television services, films and recording studios, and so on, (e) public libraries, museums and galleries and (f) performers and performing groups.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 6 May 1986]: It is not clear what the hon. Member means by "all cultural events". The information available in respect of the other categories he has mentioned is as follows:

In so far as the tax deductible figures for 1984-85 may contain import value added tax that cannot be separately identified, the net tax figures for that year may be distorted.

VAT Registration Applications

Mr. Cartwright asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many applications for value added tax registration were outstanding at the Orpington value added tax office at the most recent convenient date;

(2) what steps he is taking to reduce the backlog of value added tax registration applications at the Orpington value added tax office;

(3) what is the current delay in obtaining a value added tax regisration number from the Orpington value added tax office.

Mr. Brooke: As at 1 April 1986 Orpington local VAT office had 192 applications for VAT registration in the course of processing. This represents a reduction of more than 100 when compared with the position 12 months earlier. Customs and Excise will continue to look for further improvement and to provide the best service possible consistent with the safeguarding of the revenue. under normal circumstances a VAT registration number is issued by the Orpington office between three and 10 days after the application is received.

Agricultural Buildings (Writing-off Allowances)

Mr. Lyell asked thee Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the cost to the Exchequer of permitting glasshouses and other specialised agricultural buildings to be written off at 25 per cent. per annum reducing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moore: Expenditure on some very specialised agricultural buildings already qualifies for 25 per cent. writing down allowances. If this allowance was extended to expenditure on all glasshouses and agricultural buildings at present attracting the 4 per cent. allowance, we tentatively estimate the cost in the first full year as £30 million, rising to some £100 million in the early 1990s.

North Sea Oil

Mr. Dubs asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of revenue from North sea oil taxation in the current financial year.

Mr. Moore: I refer the hon. Member to table 1.2 of the 1986-87 financial statement and Budget report.

EC Budget

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish in the Official Report a table showing for each year since 1972 the appropriation for the European Economic Community budget and the amount of any supplementary budgets for (a) agriculture, (b) other purposes and (c) the amount actually spent; and if he will provide the estimate for the current year and the forecast for 1987.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 6 May 1986]: Details of the appropriations for the European Economic Community budgets since 1972 are given in the official journal of the European Communities, "Annual Report by the Court of Auditors". The copies covering the period 1973 to 1984 are in the Library of the House. The figures for the 1985 and 1986 budgets are as follows, along with the amounts likely to be proposed by the Commission in the draft supplementary budget for this year. Details of the amount actually spent in 1985 have not yet been published by the Commission. The preliminary draft budget for 1987 has not yet been submitted to the Council.

EC (Agricultural Expenditure)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate (a) overall and (b) agricultural spending by the European Economic Community in 1986; what were the limits on spending set in 1985; what are the implications for the budgetary discipline framework agreed at Fontainebleau; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 6 May 1986]: Total Community expenditure in the 1986 budget, as agreed at the Council's second reading, amounts to some 32,686 mecu. Within this, provision was made for agricultural guarantee spending of 21,012 mecu, comprising 20,445 mecu for agricultural market support in the Community of Ten (some 170 mecu below the agricultural guideline set in 1985 for the Community of Ten) plus 567 mecu for Spain and Portugal. The Commission has announced its intention of presenting a supplementary and amending budget which, if adopted, would increase total spending by 1,810 mecu to 34,496 mecu. This would include an increase in agricultural spending of 915 mecu in 1986, which would involve exceeding the guideline limit by some 745 mecu. When the Commission formally presents its proposals for additional spending, the United Kingdom will consider them carefully, taking into account the implications of the Council's conclusions on budget discipline and the particular circumstances of the current year.

National Insurance

Mr. Meacher asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the effect on Exchequer revenues of removing the half tax relief from class 4 national insurance contributions.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 6 May 1986]: The latest available estimate of the cost of the relief (£55 million for 1985-86) was published in table 2.24 of "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1986-87 to 1988-89" (Cmnd. 9702).

Business Expansion Scheme

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the value of tax relief for private hospital or nursing home developments under the business expansion scheme.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 21 April 1986, c. 38]: Investments in private hospitals and nursing homes under the business expansion scheme totalled about £4 million in 1983-84. Information about 1984-85 investments is not yet complete, but of the £136 million investments for which information is available centrally about £17 million were in respect of private hospitals and nursing homes. At an average level of relief of 50 per cent. this represents about £2 million revenue costs in 1983-84 and about £8·5 million revenue cost in 1984-85. It is too soon to provide an estimate of 1985-86 investments.

Personal Taxation

Mr. Corrie asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of the population pay tax who have an income of up to £15,000 in 1985-86; and what was the percentage in 1978-79.

Mr. Pike asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what percentage of the population with an income of up to £15,000 will pay income tax as a result of the 1986 Budget; and what percentage paid tax on the same figure in real terms in 1978-79;

(2) what percentage of the population paid income tax with an income of up to £15,000 in 1978-79; and what percentage pay tax on the same figure in real terms now.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 21 April 1986, c. 38]: Estimates are shown. For each pair of income ranges the levels of income are the same in real terms, using the RPI. The analysis is in terms of tax units, that is counting married couples as one and combining their incomes. The bases for the percentages are the numbers of adult single people and married couples with incomes for income tax purposes below the specified levels in the respective years.

Income Tax

Mr. Frank Field asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the percentage share of tax paid by the top 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 per cent. of income earners for each year since 1978-79.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 2 May 1986, c. 530-31]: The available information is as follows. The analysis is of single people and married couples paying income tax in each year. The quantiles are determined by reference to tax liability. The figures are based on the surveys of personal incomes for years up to 1983-84. For subsequent years, they are based on projections from the 1983-84 survey and are therefore provisional.

DEFENCE

American Forces

92. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he next intends to discuss the rules of engagement for American forces stationed in Britain with the American Government.

Mr. Stanley: My right hon. Friend has no present plans to do so.

Royal Ordnance plc

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to meet the directors of Royal Ordnance plc.

Mr. Lee: My right hon. Friend and my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement have regular meetings with the chairman and chief executive of royal Ordnance plc and with other directors as necessary.

Departmental Property

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has for the sale of surplus land owned by his Department.

Mr. Lee: It is the policy of the Ministry of Defence to pass land and buildings which are no longer required for defence purposes to the PSA for disposal. Since 1979 the estate has been reduced by almost 28,000 acres.

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Defence what bids have been received from developers for the purchase of properties owned by his Department in Kent.

Mr. Lee: In recent months no bids have been received, but two speculative inquiries have been made on behalf of clients seeking development land in Kent.

Defence Sales Organisation

Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many people are employed by the Defence Sales Organisation; and what proportion travel abroad in a representational capacity.

Mr. Lee: The Defence Export Services Organisation —previously called the Defence Sales Organisation— currently employs some 260 staff including service personnel. Approximately 30 per cent. of these travelled abroad on business in 1985.

Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the countries which his Defence Sales Organisation has visited during 1985; and what were the total sales achieved during the year.

Mr. Lee: The countries visited on business by staff of the Defence Export Services Organisation during 1985 were as follows:

Algeria
Bahrain
Belgium
Brazil
Brunei
Cameroon
China
Cyprus
Ecuador
Egypt
Finland
France
Federal Republic of Germany
Gabon
Greece
Hong Kong
India
Indonesia
Italy
Japan

Kuwait
Malaysia
Netherlands
Oman
Pakistan
Qatar
Saudi Arabia
Singapore
Spain
South Korea
Sweden
Switzerland
Thailand
Turkey
United Arab Emirate
United States of America
Venezuela
Yugoslavia
Zimbabwe

The total value of receipts from exports of identified defence equipment in 1985 was £813 million.

Mr. Norman Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Defence if it is customary for the Defence Sales Organisation to inform the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation of its contracts and supply arrangements.

Mr. Lee: No.

Royal Navy Establishments, Wales

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many civilians are employed in each Royal Navy establishment in Wales.

Mr. Lee: The information requested is provided in the following table:

ENVIRONMENT

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is satisfied with current methods of nuclear waste disposal at Drigg; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Current methods of disposal at Drigg do not represent any unacceptable risks to those who work there or to those who live nearby. Nevertheless, improvements can be and are being made.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what exploratory work on potential low level, intermediate level and high level nuclear waste sites have been carried out since 1979.

Mr. Waldegrave: Research was carried out on behalf of the Department at Altnabreac in Scotland and in Cornwall to develop procedures to investigate sites for the disposal of high level waste. No exploratory field work has been done on potential sites for low-level or intermediate-level radioactive waste since 1979, except for one soil sample taken at the Elstow site.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what measures will be taken to monitor radiation exposure in local populations and water supplies at the chosen site for a nuclear dump;

(2) what measures will be taken to monitor radiation activity at a nuclear waste dump over a 10-year period once it is operational.

Mr. Waldegrave: Radioactive waste disposal sites operated by NIREX will be licensed by the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate and all waste disposals authorised by my Department and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. It will be a condition of the authorisation that the site operator carries out a programme of environmental monitoring agreed with the authorising Departments. This must be comprehensive and will include the monitoring of air, surface water, ground water, and foodstuffs in the surrounding area.

In addition to the monitoring by the site operator, the regulatory authorities will carry out their own checks.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether any efforts have been made by his Department to assess the longer term effects of low level radiation on local populations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Department of the Environment commissions research on the techniques and safety of radioactive waste disposal. Research into the long-term health effects of low level ionising radiation is commissioned by the Department of Health and Social Security. The Committee on the Medical Effects of Radiation in the Environment provides expert advice on this matter.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many metres deep nuclear waste will be buried at the chosen site.

Mr. Waldegrave: This is a matter that will be addressed by the United Kingdom Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive Ltd. following a detailed programme of on-site investigations and safety assessments. The sites identified by NIREX offer the potential for a variety of engineering solutions in terms of depth of burial.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment on what criteria low level and intermediate level nuclear waste are to be segregated for dumping.

Mr. Waldegrave: Definitions of low-level and intermediate level radioactive waste are set out in the fifth annual report of the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee. Any authorisation for disposal of waste will take account of the characteristics of the disposal site and facility such that the "Principles for the Protection of the Human Environment," (HMSO, December 1984) are respected.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many studies have been carried out by his Department since 1979 on the behaviour of radionuclides released from sites of nuclear waste disposal.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department is conducting an extensive programme of research on the physical and chemical processes which could have a bearing on the migration of radionuclides from a nuclear waste disposal site on land. Summaries of this research are given in the annual progress reports prepared by my Department's radioactive waste division and published by HMSO. About 150 research contracts for such studies have been completed since 1979.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if any improvements are to be made to emergency procedures to be followed in the event of a leak of radioactivity during burial of nuclear low level or intermediate waste; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Disposals of radioactive wastes from nuclear and other sources are made at the Drigg site operated by British Nuclear Fuels plc. Details are published annually in the BNFL annual reports. There is no requirement for the radioactive waste to be contained within waste packages at Drigg, and therefore there can be no question of a leak of radioactivity during the process of burial.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what studies have been conducted by his Department into the conditioning and containment of intermediate waste since 1979.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Department has commissioned a substantial research programme on the generic options for the conditioning and management of intermediate level waste. Abstracts of these studies are published annually in the progress reports on "Sponsored Research on Radioactive Waste Management" which are available from the Department's sub-library at South Ruislip.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what criteria he has used to judge the adequacy of NIREX's engineered containment philosophy for shallow repositories of nuclear waste.

Mr. Waldegrave: My Department will need to be satisfied that any proposals made by UK NIREX Ltd. for shallow repositories comply with the requirements set out in "Principles for the Protection of the Human Environment" published by HMSO, December 1984.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what current measures his Department is taking to alleviate the radioactive contamination which has occurred in the Irish Sea.

Mr. Waldegrave: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to a question from the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) on 30 April, at columns 413-14.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the extent to which any future dumping site in the United Kingdom will be engineered on a basis similar to existing sites in the United States of America.

Mr. Waldegrave: Various designs for radioactive waste disposal facilities have been investigated in the United States of America and several different types are in use. The experience they have gained will be taken into account when my Department assesses specific proposals made by UK NIREX Ltd. Some of the options currently under investigation in the United Kingdom are described in the executive's publications.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what evidence his Department has that proves burial of nuclear waste is technologically safe.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Department sponsors a considerable programme of independent research to assess the safety of waste disposal technology. The results of these studies indicate that the risks to the public, using the methods proposed will be less than the targets set by the authorising Departments as specified in "Principles for the Protection of the Human Environment" HMSO December 1984.

Derelict Land

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how much derelict land has been reclaimed by regional area in England for each year from 1975 to 1985; how much funding was available for each year; and if, in any year, it was underspent;

(2) how much derelict land has been reclaimed by county area in England for each year from 1975 to 1985; how much funding was available for each year; and if, in any year, it was underspent.

Sir George Young: Details of the amount of derelict land reclaimed by county and regional area in England in each financial year for the period 1 April 1974 to 31 March 1982 are given in the "Survey of Derelict Land in England 1982", a copy of which is available in the Library. The amount of derelict land reclaimed in each financial year with the aid of derelict land grant by region for the period 1 April 1982 to 31 March 1985 is shown on a comparable basis:

Marina, Bourne End, Hertfordshire

Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Environment on what date appeal App/M1900/C/85/2951 was lodged against Dacorum borough council's decision not to grant planning permission for a marina at Bourne End, Hertfordshire; and if he will make a statement on the arrangements for the public inquiry.

Mr. Tracey: Two planning appeals by Sunjoy Ltd., in respect of the refusal by Dacorum borough council to grant planning permission for a mooring basin and related development at Pix Farm Lane, Bourne End, Hertfordshire, were received on 12 November 1985. The appeal numbers are APP/A1910/A/8540450 and 42262. A public local inquiry will be held by a planning inspector on 19 August at the Civic Centre, Hemel Hempstead, commencing at 10 am.

Appeal numbers APP/M1900/C/85/2951 relates to an appeal against an enforcement notice issued by Hertfordshire county council in respect of an alleged breach of planning control by the tipping of hardcore and rubble at Sharpes Lane, Hemel Hempstead. This appeal is proceeding separately and, as the parties have agreed to the written representations procedure, there will be no public local inquiry.

Wates Houses (Reinstatement Systems)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report the reasons for the delay in the issue of licences for reinstatement systems relating to Wates dwellings by PRC Homes Ltd.

Sir George Young: PRC Homes Ltd. has to appraise carefully any proposed repair systems put to it and can license a repair method only when that process has been completed satisfactorily. One method for reinstating Wates houses is currently being appraised and that should be completed in the next few weeks. Another method is expected to be resubmitted shortly and then sent for appraisal. I cannot of course prejudge the outcome of those appraisals and, in particular, whether licenses will be granted.

Kenwood House

Mr. Foot asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many members of staff at Kenwood House have retired or taken redundancy as a result of the abolition of the Greater London council;

(2) how many times rooms at Kenwood House, Hampstead, have been closed to the public since English Heritage took control of the property following the abolition of the Greater London council on 1 April;

(3) on how many occasions Kenwood House has been closed before the official time of 7 pm since 1 April;

(4) if it is the Government's policy to reduce staff at English Heritage properties;

(5) what has happened to the Government funding of £2 million made available to English Heritage to deal with the problems facing Kenwood House, Ranger's House, Blackheath and Marble Hill House, Twickenham, following abolition of the Greater London council.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: An extra £7·75 million was allocated in the commission's grant-in-aid for 1986-87 for all the functions of the GLC transferred to it under the Local Government Act 1985. This figure was agreed with the commission and derived from an estimate of the GLC's cost of these functions.

The commission indicated by letter to the GLC staff members working at, or in connection with, Kenwood House, Marble Hill House and Ranger's House that they were prepared to make job offers to all of them. Eight of these staff (four of whom were connected with Kenwood House) indicated that they did not wish to receive a job offer because they intended either to take redundancy compensation or to retire early. One staff member (also Kenwood House) to whom a job offer was made did not accept.

Detailed questions of opening hours and custodial arrangements are a matter for the commission.

Dampness (Dwellings)

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make available to the relevant local authorities special funds for the elimination of damp from no-fines dwellings; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: Local authorities' needs for expenditure of this nature are taken into account, within the overall resources available, when setting their housing investment programme allocations.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Hargreaves asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his latest estimate of the amount of block grant to be recycled; and how much each authority will receive.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The total estimated grant underclaim is now about £628 million. This would be distributed to local authorities at first supplementary report as illustrated in the table. Their actual grant entitlements will depend on a number of factors, not least their latest budget decisions.

On this basis I do not expect my guarantee of £500 million to be called upon.

NB The grant recycling pool of £628 million is calculated from budgeted expenditure as returned on BG12 returns.
*These authorities are in receipt of either no or 100 per cent. block grant at their budgeted expenditure level. In neither case are they covered by the grant guarantee.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what response he has had from the city of Manchester to his Department's consultation paper entitled "Review of the Local Authority Capital Expenditure Control System in England and Wales", and to the related Green Paper on "Paying for Local Government"; how many other responses he has received; and when he expects to make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The city of Manchester's response to the proposals in the consultation paper on the review of the local authority capital control system and the related parts of the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government" (Cmnd. 9714), was sent to the Department on 23 April. My right hon. Friend will be considering this along with other 347 responses we have received before making any decisions about how best to proceed. We have also received 279 responses about the other local government finance issues discussed in the Green Paper.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prisoners

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average weekly cost of feeding a prisoner.

Mr. Mellor: The average weekly cost of feeding a prisoner in penal establishments in England and Wales is £5·60.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is (a) the average amount of money earned by prisoners for prison work and (b) the range of possible earnings.

Mr. Mellor: The average weekly earnings paid to inmates in prison service establishments in England and Wales is now £1·93. Details of the full range of earnings payable are contained in circular instruction No. 28/85, a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much prisoners earn if they are unable to work owing to either lack of available work or to the unavailability of prison officers.

Mr. Mellor: Inmates in prison service establishments in England and Wales for whom employment is not available are paid at the basic rate of £1·28 per week.

The rate paid to inmates who are temporarily prevented from working by the non-availability of prison officers varies according to the rules of the particular pay scheme under which they are normally paid. Generally for an initial period while action is taken to redeploy the inmates, they are paid the average rate they had been earning before the interruption.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state, for the latest year for which figures are available (a) the total number of persons jailed for all offences in England and Wales and (b) the total number of persons jailed in England and Wales for schedule 1 offences within the meaning of the Criminal Justice Act 1982.

Mr. Mellor [pursuant to his reply, 28 April 1986, c. 304]: Information on the total number of persons given immediate custodial sentences is published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales" (table 7.15 of the volume for 1984, Cmnd. 9621) and analyses by type of offence are to be found in the supplementary tables to that publication; for example, "Criminal Statistics, Supplementary Tables 1984, volume 2, table S2.4". Of the 78,000 sentenced to immediate custody in 1984, 9,600 had been convicted of offences specified in schedule 1 to the Criminal Justice Act 1982. Corresponding information for 1985 is not yet available.

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many category A prisoners there are in England and Wales.

Mr. Mellor: As at 1 May 1986 there were 314 prisoners permaneently categorised A and 133 provisionally categorised A.

Prison Officers

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prison officers are currently in post in each of Her Majesty's prisons; if he will publish comparable figures for each of the past five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: The number of prison officers in post in each of Her Majesty's prisons in England and Wales on 1 April 1986 is listed in column (a) of the table together with comparable figures for 31 December 1984 (b); 31 December 1983 (c); 31 December 1982 (d); and 31 December 1981 (e). Figures for 1980 are not available.

Immigration

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of non-patrials repatriated compulsorily for psychiatric reasons; and to which countries they were repatriated in 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985, respectively.

Mr. Waddington: The available information is given in the table. Corresponding information for 1985 is not yet available.

Peacock Committee Report

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if it remains his expectation that he will receive the report of the Peacock committee in the summer; and when he expects to make it available to hon. Members.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Yes. My right hon. Friend hopes to be able to present the report to Parliament before the summer recess.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Ethnic Minorities (Psychiatric Facilities)

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many health authorities have a specific working group or specific policy concerned with the provision of equal and appropriate psychiatric facilities for members of ethnic minorities; and if he will name them.

Mr. Whitney This information is not collected centrally.

Spectacles

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if the vouchers which the Government propose to introduce for spectacles lenses will be sufficiently flexible to meet the cost of the more expensive lenses required by certain patients with severe eyesight problems.

Mr. Hayhoe There will be a small range of vouchers with values related to the powers of different groups of lenses. The amount of financial help will therefore depend on the severity of the patient's eyesight problem but is intended to provide for the purchase of a basic pair of spectacles related to the individual's needs.

Hospitals

Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many new hospitals have been started since May 1979; and where are they located.

Mr. Whitney The number of new hospital schemes in England started since May 1979 is set out in the table. This lists only those costing in excess of £5 million for the relevant data for Scotland and Wales the hon. Member may wish to ask my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and Wales.

Artificial Limb and Appliance Service

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish the names of the members of the new board of control of the artificial limb and appliance service, and their present occupations.

Mr. Newton: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to the hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones) on 6 May.

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list by location the artificial limb and appliance centres in England, the number of limb-fitting surgeons and the cost of each of the centres in the last financial year available.

Mr. Newton: The information requested is as follows:

Centres and Sub-Centres	Number of Medical officers*
Birmingham
Leicester	4
Stoke on Trent
Wolverhampton
Brighton	1
Bristol	2
Cambridge
Norwich	2
Cleveland	1

* The term "Medical Officer" rather than "limb-fitting surgeon" is now used to describe DHSS medical staff based at ALACs because the doctors concerned do not undertake surgical procedures as part of their normal duties.
The staff numbers shown exclude headquarters staff at London and Blackpool.

Detailed costs are not available for each centre. The total cost of the artificial limb and appliance service in 1985-86 was £80 million.

Severely Disabled People (Cushions)

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will reconsider his decision to suspend the provision of special cushions for the severely disabled.

Mr. Newton: We have made no such decision. A variety of cushions for the severely disabled may be supplied by health authorities, local authorities and the Department's wheelchair service, depending on the reason for the requirement. The provision of one type of cushion through the wheelchair service was temporarily interrupted earlier this year, but limited supplies are again available to meet clinical needs.

Benefits

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the number of claimants in receipt of (a) sickness benefit, (b) invalidity benefit and pension, (c) industrial disablement benefit, (d) non-contributory invalidity pension, housewives non-contributory invalidity pension or severe disablement allowance for the latest available year at the Greenock and Port Glasgow offices of his Department.

Mr. Major: The number of claimants in receipt of sickness and invalidity benefit/pension and severe disablement allowance as at 8 April 1986, and in receipt of industrial disablement benefit as at 11 February 1986 (the latest dates for which information is available) at the Greenock and Port Glasgow social security offices is as follows:

	Greenock	Port Glasgow
Sickness and invalidity benefit/pension	3,892	1,705
Severe disablement allowance	459	251
Industrial disablement benefit	560	391

Separate records are not kept of the numbers of claimants in receipt of sickness and invalidity benefit/pension.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the number of claimants excluding pensioner claimants and claimants with dependent children, in receipt of (a) unemployment benefit only, (b) supplementary benefit only and (c) unemployment benefit and supplementary benefit for the latest available year at the Greenock and Port Glasgow offices of his Department;

(2) what is the number of claimant couples with children in receipt of (a) unemployment benefit only, (b) supplementary benefit only and (c) unemployment benefit and supplementary benefit for the latest available year at the Greenock and Port Glasgow offices of his Department.

Mr. Major: I regret that this information is not available. Statistics are not kept routinely so that the information requested could be obtained only by a special exercise, which would be disproportionately expensive.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the number of (a) single payments and (b) urgent needs payments, weekly and one-off, paid to claimants who (i) are under pensionable age and are not required to register for work, (ii) are under pensionable age required to register for work and (iii) are over pensionable age, and what is (x) the average rate per 1,000 claimants in (i), (ii) and (iii), (y) the average payment made to claimants in (i), (ii) and (iii) and (z) the number of claimants in (i), (ii) and (iii) with dependent children for the latest available year at the Greenock and Port Glasgow offices of his Department.

Mr. Major: The following table shows, for the categories of claimants specified, numbers of single payments and urgent needs payments made in the year up to 8 April 1986, by the Greenock and Port Glasgow offices. Comparable information about the number of claimants with dependent children is not available.

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the ratio of National Health Service beds to population by region for the latest month for which figures are available; and what were the comparative figures for 1979 and 1983.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 30 April 1986, c. 436]: The available information is given in the table. Since it can be misleading to consider bed figures alone, I have included national figures for the number of cases treated.

Mr. Wigley asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish figures showing the incidence of bovine tuberculosis in each English county for every year since 1981.

Mrs. Fenner: The number of new herds with bovine tuberculosis reactors in each English county for each year 1981-85 is shown in the table.

Water Pollution

Mr. Evennett asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what liaison arrangements his Department maintains with water authorities for controlling water pollution; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: My Department maintains close liaison with the water authorities at both national and local level on the control of water pollution.

Sherry

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 30 April, Official Report, column 440, why the provisions on British sherry in article 129 of the Treaty of Accession of Spain and Portugal required to be enacted as a means of providing for the continued use of this description; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 6 May 1986]: With the accession of Spain to the European Community it was recognised that under Community regulation 338/79, the description "Sherry" would otherwise have been restricted to the quality wines from the Jerez region of Spain. Therefore this derogation in respect of "British Sherry" was negotiated.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish in the Official Report a table showing the amount set aside in the budget for the common agricultural policy each year since 1972 and the amount actually spent; and what is the forecast for the current year.

Mr. Jopling [pursuant to his reply, 6 May 1986]: The following table shows the amounts entered for expenditure under the common agricultural policy in the original budget for each year since 1972 and the amount actually spent each year, other than 1985 for which the final figure is not yet available. The budget adopted by the European Parliament for 1986 provides 22,009 mecu for expenditure under the CAP but the Commission has announced its intention of proposing a supplementary budget to provide a further 1,015 mecu for CAP expenditure.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Members' Tea Rooms

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Lord Privy Seal what would be the estimated extra cost of opening the Members' Tea Room at (a) 9 am and (b) 9.15 am on Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays.

Mr. Biffen: The extra staffing cost of opening the Tea Room at 9 am on Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays would be about £30 per week. On the same basis, the extra cost of opening at 9.15 am would be about £15 per week.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Republic of Ireland

18. Mr. Gow asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next expects to meet the Foreign Minister of the Irish Republic.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I see the Foreign Minister of the Irish Republic regularly at EC meetings. The next such meeting will be in Brussels on 12-13 of this month, and there will be a further one on 7-8 June in the Netherlands.

Libya

20. Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the present state of relations with Libya.

28. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about relations with Libya.

45. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on relations with Libya.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We have been discussing with our partners and allies a concerted programme of action to combat the threat of Libyan-directed terrorism. Specific action has been taken to implement the decisions taken by the Foreign Ministers of the Twelve in Luxembourg on 21 April. Effective measures were also agreed at the Tokyo summit.

On the British community in Libya, I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas).

23. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will outline the measures agreed by the European Economic Community to restrict the activities of Libyan nationals; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I refer my hon. Friend to my statement to the House on 23 April, at column 299, about the measures agreed by Foreign Ministers of the Twelve on 21 April.

26. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the impact on Britain's relations with other countries of British involvement in the recent United States raid on Libya.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have taken careful note of the reactions of other countries, which have demonstrated considerable understanding of why we supported the action taken by the United States against Libyan state-directed terrorism.

37. Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions have taken place with the United States Government concerning the situation in Libya.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We continue to have full and frequent discussions with the United States Government about Libya. The most recent occasion for a high level exchange of views was during the Tokyo summit on 4 to 6 May.

40. Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made by European Economic Community countries to the United Kingdom about its public support for the United States military action in Libya.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell).

56. Mr. Barnett asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which European Economic Community countries have publicly condemned, and which have publicly supported, the United States military attack on Libya.

65. Mr. James Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which European Economic Community countries have supported the United States military attack on Libya.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Apart from the United Kingdom, which supported the United States action, the initial reaction of most EC countries was cautious, and in some cases critical. All our partners agreed on the urgent need for collective action to counter Libyan state directed terrorism: and as I told the House in my statement on 23 April we have now agreed on a package of measures for this purpose.

57. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will consult his European Economic Community colleagues before giving assent to further support for the use of United States air bases in the United Kingdom in mounting military attacks on Libya.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The use of United States forces of bases in the United Kingdom is a matter for joint decision by Her Majesty's Government and the United States Government. We are consulting our European Community partners very closely about what more should be done to counter Libyan state-directed terrorism.

17. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received from his European Economic Community colleagues concerning British involvement in the United States raid on Libya on 15 April.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell).

19. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received from Arab states concerning British involvement in the United States raid on Libya on 15 April.

Mr. Renton: We have had some expressions of criticism, of varying degrees of formality, from certain Arab countries. However, as my right hon. and learned Friend said on 23 April, the Arab world has been more understanding than many people at first thought likely.

Middle East

21. Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on current progress towards peace in the middle east.

27. Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a progress report on the middle east peace process.

86. Mr. Walters asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on efforts being made to revive the middle east peace process.

Mr. Renton: We continue to support realistic efforts to achieve peaceful solutions for the region's conflicts.

31. Mr. Hicks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he plans to take any fresh initiative to seek to resolve the Arab-Israeli dispute following the action by the United States of America in Libya; and if he will make a statement.

61. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he is taking to encourage a new initiative in the middle east.

Mr. Renton: We continue to attach great importance to a peaceful settlement of the Arab-Israel dispute and are in close touch with the parties, with whom the prime responsibility for progress lies.

Afghanistan

22. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for the Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next plans to meet the United Nations Secretary General to discuss Afghanistan.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend hopes to see the United Nations Secretary General in the near future. He would expect to discuss Afghanistan during their meeting.

Chile

24. Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has held with the Chilean Government concerning human rights in Chile; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: As I told the hon. Member for Warrington, North (Mr. Hoyle) on 9 April, we continue to make clear our concern about the Chilean Government's human rights record.

We supported both the resolution at the United Nations Commission on Human Rights of 14 March criticising Chile's record and the EC presidency statement of 18 March expressing concern about restriction of freedoms in Chile.

Contadora Countries

25. Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent contacts he has had with the Contadora group of countries; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend last held discussions with the Contadora group at the meeting of Foreign Ministers of the European Community, central America and the Contadora countries in Luxembourg, last November.

In April the Dutch Foreign Minister, Mr. Van den Broek, in his capacity as President in Office of the Council of Ministers of the European Community, had informal discussions with the participants in the Contadora meeting in Panama following which the Twelve publicly urged the central American states to continue negotiating a comprehensive and verifiable Contadora agreement.

Central America

29. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to visit central America.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend has no immediate plans to do so.

41. Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has made to the United States of America concerning United States foreign policy in central America; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: As my right hon. and learned Friend made clear on 9 April in reply to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) at column 155, we support the Contadora peace initiative; we do not believe the problems of central America can be solved by armed force. The United States Government are well aware of our views.

EC (Foreign Policy)

30. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the ways in which he expects the new European Economic Community foreign policy secretariat to improve the co-ordination of foreign policy within the European Economic Community.

Mrs. Chalker: The new secretariat will work under the authority of the presidency of the day. It will help to provide continuity between presidencies. It will support the presidency in organising the work of political co-operation. And it will help to ensure consistency between foreign policy objectives identified by member states in political co-operation and the external policies separately decided upon within the Community framework on matters such as trade and aid.

Jordan

32. Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on United Kingdom relations with the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Our relations with the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan are excellent.

CSCE, Switzerland

33. Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what matters have been raised by the British delegation to the conference of security and co-operation in Europe meeting of experts on human contacts in Berne, Switzerland.

Mr. Renton: The delegation has already raised a large number of issues covered by the mandate for the meeting, especially those of humanitarian concern such as divided families. I am arranging for copies of all the main statements made by the head of the United Kingdom delegation, Sir Anthony Williams, to be placed in the Library of the House.

53. Mr. Portillo asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the British delegation at the conference for co-operation and security in Europe conference of experts on human contacts in Berne will raise the subject of difficulties encountered by tourists visiting the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. Renton: Yes. We expect to address all items in the mandate for the meeting, which includes tourism.

Israel

34. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about relations with Israel.

Mr. Renton: There are close links between the United Kingdom and Israel. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has accepted an invitation to visit Israel soon.

Test Ban Treaty

35. Mr. James Lamond asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he makes of the implication of the United Kingdom's acquisition of the Trident missile system for the negotiation of a comprehensive test ban treaty.

Mr. Renton: We remain committed to seeking progress towards a comprehensive test ban treaty, but believe it would be premature for negotiations proper to be resumed until the prospects for agreement are better. The Government are equally committed to the modernisation of Britain's independent nuclear deterrent, and will take steps to ensure this, in the same way as previous Governments have done. In the absence of any immediate prospects of CTBT negotiations, there is no linkage between the two issues.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consultation he has had with the United States Administration on prospects for a comprehensive test ban treaty; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: As my right hon. and learned Friend said on 5 February, views on nuclear testing constraints have been exchanged periodically with the United States and the Soviet Union, participants in the trilateral negotiations which were suspended in 1980, as well as with other states.

Palestine Liberation Organisation

36. Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will, during his presidency of the European Economic Community, seek to meet the chairman of the Palestine Liberation Organisation.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. and learned Friend has at present no plans to do so.

Town Twinning

38. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance is given by his Department to projects involving twinning of United Kingdom towns with towns in other countries.

Mr. Eggar: In the United Kingdom, town twinning is co-ordinated by the joint twinning committee of Local Authority Associations of Great Britain and Northern Ireland. This body deals directly with local authorities and twinning associations in the United Kingdom. The FCO works closely with the joint twinning committee in the development of partnerships. Its departments in London and United Kingdom missions abroad also assist this process.

Chemical Weapons

39. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will report progress on the work of the chemical weapons convention at the conference on disarmament in Geneva.

42. Sir Peter Blaker asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if there has been any recent progress in the negotiations on chemical weapons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: I refer my hon. Friend and my right hon. Friend to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) on 24 April at column 222.

Falkland Islands

43. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if fishery practices around the Falkland Islands were a subject of discussion during the recent visit to the Falklands by the Minister of State, the right hon. Baroness Young; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and noble Friend discussed the subject of fisheries extensively with councillors and at a public meeting during her visit to the Falkland Islands from 23 to 28 February. She explained in detail our policy of working for a multilaterally-based conservation and management regime under FAO auspices.

Nicaragua

44. Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the Government's policy regarding the action taken by Nicaragua against the United States of America at the International Court of Justice.

Mr. Eggar: It would not be appropriate for us to comment on a matter on which the International Court of Justice is still deliberating.

Spain-Gibraltar (Relations)

46. Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on relations between Spain and Gibraltar since Spanish accession to the European Economic Community.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Relations between Spain and Gibraltar have developed steadily since the opening of the frontier last year. Spanish accession to the European Community has given this process a substantial further impetus.

Force Reductions (Europe)

47. Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Mr. Gorbachev's recent proposals for the reduction of forces in Europe.

Mr. Renton: We welcome Mr. Gorbachev's recognition that it is necessary to address both the imbalance of conventional forces in Europe and the question of nuclear arms reductions. We shall consider his idea carefully in consultation with our allies. Evidence of genuine Eastern interest in conventional arms control would of course be provided by constructive responses to the serious Western proposals on the table at the mutual and balanced force reductions talks in Vienna and at the Stockholm conference on disarmament in Europe.

Washington DC (Ministerial Visit)

48. Mr. Temple Morris asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to seek to make an official visit to Washington DC.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I will be visiting Washington from 27 to 28 May when I shall have the opportunity to discuss with Secretary of State Shultz a wide range of international issues.

Bulgaria (Turkish Minority)

49. Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he is taking within the context of the conference for security and co-operation in Europe in the light of the Amnesty International report on the treatment of the Turkish minority in Bulgaria, a copy of which has been sent to him; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: Reports of mistreatment, including those quoted in the Amnesty International report, have not been satisfactorily explained by the Bulgarian authorities. This is a matter of concern, which we have pointed out to the Bulgarian authorities, both bilaterally and in international fora. The issue was raised at CSCE meetings in Ottawa and Budapest in 1985, and has also been raised at the current meeting in Berne.

Disarmament

50. Mr. Marland asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to publicise those elements in recent Soviet disarmament proposals which are unacceptable to Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Renton: In his speech to the Foreign Press Association on 17 March my right hon. and learned Friend gave a detailed assessment of current Soviet proposals relating to both the Geneva Nuclear and Space Talks and to the other arms control negotiations currently in progress. A copy of the speech is available in the Library. We are still studying the latest proposals on conventional arms control, made in East Berlin on 18 April by Mr. Gorbachev.

Helsinki Final Act

51. Mr. Knowles asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next expects to discuss Soviet infringements of the Helsinki final act with a representative of the Soviet Government.

Mr. Renton: We take every suitable opportunity to discuss with the Soviet Government the importance of better implementation of the Helsinki final act. My right hon. and learned Friend expects to do so when he next meets the Soviet Foreign Minister.

Anglo-Arab Relations

52. Mr. Dubs asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Britain's relations with the Arab countries following the United States attack on Libya.

Mr. Renton: We do not believe the action taken by the United States against Libya has significantly impaired our relations with the Arab countries.

Anglo-American Relations

54. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has held with the United States of America concerning the implications for United States-United Kingdom relations of current action against the United States of America in the International Court of Justice in The Hague.

Mr. Eggar: We regularly discuss important issues with the United States Government. They are well aware of our views.

Anglo-Indian Relations

55. Mr. Rowe asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment his Department has made of the state of Anglo-Indian relations in the wake of his visit to India.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend was given a warm and cordial welcome; relations are good.

Anglo-Soviet Relations

58. Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the impact of Her Majesty's Government's involvement in the bombing of Libya on Anglo-Soviet relations.

Mr. Renton: The Soviet Union protested to Her Majesty Ambassador in Moscow about our support for the United States action against terrorist targets in Libya. He responded vigorously. Bilateral exchanges with the Soviet Union continue, including a recent successful visit by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy. We look to the Soviet Union to use its influence with Libya to restrain it from promoting terrorism.

Terrorism

59. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the latest international action to combat terrorism from the middle east and elsewhere.

Mr. Eggar: I refer my hon. Friend to the statement given by my right hon. and learned Friend on 23 April at column 299.

Foreign Affairs Council

60. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will seek to put the matter of kidnap insurance on the agenda of the next meeting of the Foreign Affairs Council.

Mrs. Chalker: The question of kidnap insurance is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. Ministers of the Interior and of Justice of the Twelve agreed in The Hague on 24 April that the possibility of measures against kidnap ransom payments should be studied urgently by officials.

European Community

62. Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the priorities which the Government will pursue during their presidency of the European Economic Community.

Mrs. Chalker: I have nothing to add to the answer that my right hon. and learned Friend gave to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Miss Maynard) on 5 March at column 176.

EC (Libya)

63. Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the European Economic Community has any plans to extend its measures imposed on Libya to other states.

Mrs. Chalker: Not at present. However, the actions taken by the Community against Libyan state terrorism are a clear warning to any other state which behaves in the same way.

Iraq (Human Rights)

64. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make representations to the Government of Iraq on human rights violations there.

Mr. Renton: We are always concerned about allegations of human rignts violations, wherever they occur. The Iraqi Government are fully aware of our close concern and this was reaffirmed to the Iraqi Foreign Minister when he visited London in December.

Nuclear Test Ban

66. Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why Her Majesty's Government rejected the proposal at the conference on disarmament in Geneva to establish an ad hoc committee on a nuclear test ban to initiate the multilateral negotiation of a treaty for the prohibition of all nuclear weapons tests.

Mr. Renton: It has long been our policy that solutions to outstanding verification issues would have to be more apparent before it would be appropriate to resume negotiations proper. We remain however ready to discuss at the Conference on Disarmament, with other interested parties, the issues of verification and the possible scope of an agreement. This approach is reflected in the long-standing draft mandate for future work of the Western Group at the Conference on Disarmament. We regret that other countries have so far not accepted it.

Nicaraguan Ambassador

67. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met the ambassador of Nicaragua; and if he has any plans to meet him in the near future.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend has not had an official meeting with the ambassador since February 1985. However, he regularly meets ambassadors at official functions.

United States

68. Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what subjects he expects to discuss at his next meeting with representatives of the United States Government.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend will have the opportunity to discuss a wide range of international issues when he meets Secretary of State Shultz in Washington on 27 May.

South Africa

69. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received advocating the use of economic sanctions against South Africa.

Mrs. Chalker: As I told the hon. Member for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie) on 5 February, we receive a large amount of correspondence both for and against the imposition of economic sanctions against South Africa.

It remains our view that further indiscriminate economic and trade sanctions would not help to bring about the necessary changes which we all wish to see in South Africa.

76. Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the most recent Government representations to the South African Government.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. and learned Friend had an opportunity to discuss a range of current issues with the South African ambassador on 25 April.

77. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the situation in South Africa.

Mrs. Chalker: We remain most concerned at the continuing violence in South Africa. We welcomed the recent repeal of the pass laws as one further step in the removal of discriminatory legislation. We are also studying the implications of a White Paper on the reform of influx control. There is a long way to go, but we hope that such measures will improve the climate for the suspension of violence and the beginning of political dialogue which are so urgently needed.

78. Mr. Terry Fields asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the European Economic Community will next discuss its policy towards South Africa.

Mrs. Chalker: Foreign Ministers of the Twelve exchange views regularly on South Africa. No date has been set for their next discussion.

81. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress of talks between the South African authorities and the Commonwealth Eminent Persons Group.

Mrs. Chalker: The members of the Commonwealth group serve in their individual capacities and are independent of Governments. We were encouraged by the group's description of their discussions in South Africa, including those with the South African Government, as "useful and constructive".

88. Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Government policy on sanctions against South Africa in the light of Bishop Tutu's recent call on the international community for punitive sanctions.

Mrs. Chalker: We are opposed to further indiscriminate economic and trade sanctions against South Africa. We believe that, rather than helping to bring about the peaceful change which we all want to see, such sanctions could make matters worse, increasing unemployment and stiffening resistance to change within South Africa.

Human Rights (Turkey)

70. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, when he next meets the Foreign Ministers in the European Council, he will raise the subject of human rights in Turkey; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans to raise this question when he next sees the Foreign Ministers of the European Community. We take every opportunity to speak to the Turkish Government about human rights. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister raised this question with Mr. Ozal during his recent visit. He assured us that progress would continue. This progress has been recognised in recent expert reports from the Council of Europe and in the settlement of the Five Nations case against Turkey at the European Commission of Human Rights.

Mr. Sallam Msallem

71. Dr. M. S. Miller asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, in the light of the statement by Mr. Sallem Msallem, a Libyan diplomat attached to the Saudi Arabian embassy in London, that any country supporting the United States action against Libya would be a target for any reprisals, he will take steps to expel Mr. Msallem; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: No. We asked the Saudi Ambassador for an explanation of Mr. Msallem's remarks. In the light of his response we are satisfied that there are not, at present, sufficient grounds to justify a request for the withdrawal of Mr. Msallem.

Syria (Terrorist Groups)

72. Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government have made to Syria about terrorist groups; what response has been received; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: On several occasions, particularly during the recent visit to London by the Syrian Foreign Minister, we have made clear to the Syrian Government our concern about terrorism and reported Syrian support for terrorist activity. Mr. Shara' said that Syria condemned terrorism and would not allow the Abu Nidal office in Damascus to engage in military or paramilitary activity.

Abu Nidal

73. Dr. McDonald asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish the evidence Her Majesty's Government have of official Government support for, or tacit acceptance of, the presence of members of the Abu Nidal terrorist organisation in their territory; and what action Her Majesty's Government are taking in the light of this evidence against the countries concerned.

Mr. Renton: The Abu Nidal organisation maintains offices in Libya and Syria. The most recent measures taken to counter Libya's sponsorship of international terrorism were described in the statement of my right hon. and learned Friend made on 23 April. He and I expressed our concern about Abu Nidal to the Foreign Minister of Syria during his visit to London in February.

African National Congress

74. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects the next meeting to take place between his officials and members of the African National Congress; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: As my right hon. and learned Friend told the house on 9 April, contacts between officials and the ANC are continuing as appropriate. The central purpose of such contact is to bring home to the ANC the importance of a suspension of violence on all sides in South Africa in order to promote a constructive dialogue.

79. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he includes leaders of the African National Congress among the genuine leaders with whom he believes the South African Government should establish a dialogue.

Mrs. Chalker: It is not for us to say who should represent black citizens in South Africa in a dialogue with the South African Government. But the ANC is clearly a most important focus of black opinion.

Commonwealth Eminent Persons Group (Report)

75. Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will seek to ensure that the Commonwealth Eminent Persons Group makes its report in time for the House to debate it before the summer recess.

Mrs. Chalker: It is for the Commonwealth Group of Eminent Persons to decide when to submit its report.

North Sea Oil (South Africa)

80. Mr. Jim Callaghan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures are being taken by Her Majesty's Government to ensure that no North sea oil is reaching South Africa.

Mrs. Chalker: We have agreed, both within the European Community and the Commonwealth, not to export oil to South Africa. Under guidelines which came into force in 1979, oil from the United Kingdom continental shelf is only exported to EC, International Energy Agency, and certain other countries with which a pattern of trade already exist. South Africa is not one of those countries.

Irish Republican Army

82. Mr. Leadbitter asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will detail all measures which have been taken against Libya on the grounds that it has supplied the Irish Republican Army with arms; and what evidence he has of links between the Irish Republican Army and other Arab countries and Arab terrorist organisations.

Mr. Renton: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister desdribed the measures we have taken against Libya in her replies to my hon. Friend the Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Hickmet) on 24 April. We are aware of speculation about Provisional IRA links with other organisations and countries. Naturally we keep a close eye on this, but it would not be in the public's interest to go into detail.

Conference on Security and Co-operation

83. Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on progress made at the conference on security and co-operation in Europe of experts on human contacts in Berne with particular reference to the removal of obstacles to effective postal and telephone communication between individuals in the signatory states to the Helsinki agreements.

Mr. Renton: Discussion is continuing at Berne on the wide range of subjects covered by the mandate. Obstacles to communication between individuals are a matter of concern to us and we aim to ensure that the issue is adequately dealt with by the conference.

Federal Republic of Germany

87. Mr. Freeson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next expects to meet the ambassador of the Federal Republic of Germany.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend expects to meet the ambassador of the Federal Republic of Germany on 12 June.

Immigration

89. Mr. Lawler asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next plans to discuss immigration matters with representatives of diplomatic missions from the Indian sub-continent.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend has at present no plans to initiate discussion with them. We are, of course, always happy to see representatives of any diplomatic mission who wish to raise immigration matters.

Iran-Iraq War

90. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent initiatives he has taken to seek to help resolve the Iran-Iraq war.

Mr. Renton: We continue to press for the implementation of United Nations Security Council Resolution 582, which was adopted unanimously by the council and offers the best hope of progress in bringing this tragic conflict to an end. In addition we remain in close touch with the UN Secretary General, whose role we strongly support, and with our colleagues within the European Community.

EC (Economic Sanctions)

Mr. Mason asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he now intends to urge his European Economic Council colleagues to apply economic sanctions against Libya, Syria and Iran; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: No. Our experience shows that economic sanctions are only effective if universally applied. The measures now being taken by the Twelve against Libya, and the Tokyo Summit's statement on terrorism are clear warnings to any country considering involvement in terrorism.

Soviet Nuclear Accident

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government's advice that United Kingdom citizens should not travel to certain locations in Russia is intended to constitute a declaration of public policy in the context of the law of contract; and to which specific Russian locations this advice applies.

Mr. Eggar: The advice is based on the best information available and it is for intending travellers to decide whether to act on it. The relevance of the advice in relation to the law of contract is a matter for the courts. The specific areas in the Soviet Union which travellers currently are being advised to avoid, unless absolutely necessary, are Kiev and the Western Ukraine: Minsk and Byelorussia: and Lithuania.

TRANSPORT

East London River Crossing

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the latest estimate of the cost of the proposed east London river crossing, indicating the individual figures for (a) the bridge over the Thames, (b) other structures, (c) road construction, (d) land and property acquisition and preparation and supervision.

Mr. Ridley: The estimates given to the hon. Member last July are currently being updated. I shall let him have the revised figures as soon as these are available.

Air Service Agreement

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he intends to seek to introduce a standardised air service agreement, to be used as the basis for future negotiations on air services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: No. I shall continue to take account of all the circumstances when preparing a draft to present to the other party when negotiating a bilateral air services agreement.

Aircraft (Evacuation Times)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if any research has been conducted into evacuation times from narrow bodied, single aisle aircraft; and if he will make a statement.

(2) if any research has been conducted into evacuation times from narrow bodied aircraft with different combinations of exits unavailable; and if he will make a statement.

(3) if any research has been conducted into the effect on passenger evacuation times of seating and partition layouts in narrow bodied, single aisle aircraft; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Civil aviation safety is the statutory responsibility of the Civil Aviation Authority. I understand from the CAA that evacuation times from narrow body single-aisle aircraft have been researched by British and American manufacturers and summarised by the Aerospace Industries Association of America. Further work has been carried out in the United States of America based upon tests and accident data, including the effects of different combinations of exits being unavailable. Research into the effects of seating and partition layouts, including aisle widths, has been based upon the results of aircraft airworthiness testing and accident data analysis. The authority is currently considering research into the effects of galley layouts and partitions following the accident at Manchester last August.

Milk Floats

Mr. Derek Spencer asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce legislation requiring milk floats to be fitted with alarms that emit an audible warning when the vehicle reverses.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Regulations were made last year to permit the use of audible reversing alarms on all goods vehicles over 2 tonnes gross weight. This includes milk floats. I believe it is best that individual operators should decide whether to fit alarms to their vehicles, bearing in mind patterns of operation.

Driving Licences

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to the answer of 1 May to the hon. Member for Leicester, East, if he will now take steps to collect and maintain information on the number of driving licences lost, stolen or withdrawn on other than medical grounds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: No. It would not be cost-effective to do so.

Aircraft Noise

Mr. George Gardiner asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the review of his policy on the control of disturbance from aircraft noise at night at Heathrow and Gatwick airports, announced in the White Paper on "Airports Policy" (Cmnd. 9542).

Mr. Michael Spicer: The report of the further research referred to in the White Paper — "DR Report 8513: Noise Disturbance at Night near Heathrow and Gatwick Airports: 1984 Check Study"—is now available. I have today initiated the consultation process to which the White Paper also referred. The consultant's present report follows on from a major research programme into the relationship between aircraft noise and sleep disturbance.

One of the findings of the report states that our night restrictions policy has resulted in reduced noise exposure and broadly reduced night noise disturbance. That report, of course, forms only one part of the review. The other important component is consultation on all aspects of our night restrictions policy. The views of all those with a direct interest in the operation of aircraft at night at Heathrow and Gatwick — primarily the industry and those it operations affect—are essential.

I am anxious, however, to hear all views to enable me to determine whether the present balance of interests is right or whether it needs updating. I would, therefore, like those whom I am formally consulting to let me have their comments by 15 July.

These comments will be carefully examined and will be taken into account in deciding whether any changes to the current night restrictions policy are appropriate.

I have placed a copy of the study report in the Library of the House.

BAA (Financing Limit)

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Transport what account he took of the programme for the completion of the north terminal at Gatwick in setting the external financing limit for the British Airports Authority for 1986-87.

Mr. Ridley: The British Airports Authority's external financing limit of £15 million for 1986-87 was decided last September. It took account of the authority's forecasts of its capital requirements and internal resources, and was thought sufficient to allow the authority to complete Gatwick north terminal in summer 1987, and make good progress on other major projects. The authority has since reduced its forecasts of internal resources and as a result has decided to delay the opening of the Gatwick north terminal. It is for the authority to order its investment priorities. The authority still expects the new terminal to be completed in time for the 1988 summer season.

Compulsory Purchase

Mr. Richard Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the number of times, in each of the last five years, that his Department has acquired the main residence of an individual by a compulsory purchase order, the number of cases, in each of the last five years, referred to the Lands Tribunal and the average length of time taken to complete an acquisition.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [pursuant to his replies, 25 March 1986, c. 418, and 1 May, c. 483]: The following paragraph was omitted from the substantive answer.

The Department's records do not differentiate between main and other residences. The average time taken to complete an acquisition could be calculated only at disproportionate cost.

WALES

Spectacles

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many hospitals in Wales, which do not at present have in-house facilities to dispense spectacles, will have such facilities available by 1 July.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The proposals for the future dispensing of glasses in the hospital eye service have been the subject of a consultation exercise. The response is still being considered and it is too early to confirm the detailed arrangements which will be made for dispensing.

Orthopaedic Surgeons

Dr. Roger Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many orthopaedic surgeons are employed by each of the health authorities in Wales who carry out hip replacement operations; and how many operations were carried out by each surgeon annually for the past five years.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The following table shows, for each district health authority in Wales, the number of orthopaedic surgeons who carried out hip replacement operations in 1984.

Health Authority	*Number of orthopaedic surgeons (including locums)
Clwyd	6
East Dyfed	4
Pembrokeshire	3
Gwent	5
Gwynedd	3
Mid Glamorgan	8
Powys	—
South Glamorgan	10
West Glamorgan	8
Wales	42

* The figure for Wales is less than the total of the figures for individual health authorities because some consultants carry out operations for more than one health authority.

Questions on the numbers of operations carried out by an individual consultant should be referred to the appropriate health authority.

Radiotherapy Treatment

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will provide information showing the current ratio of radiotherapy units to patients in each part of Wales; if he will make a statement on the present level of care offered to cancer patients in Wales in general.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Radiotherapy is provided for Welsh patients at two centres in South Wales where the ratio of units to potential patients is approximately 1:1,000,000. As patients from North Wales are treated at a number of units in England it is not possible to provide this information in respect of North Wales. The level of service identified for South Wales above is in accordance with accepted norms.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table indicating the average length of time cancer patients have to wait before receiving radiotherapy treatment in Wales; and if he is satisfied with the present situation in Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: During 1985, the latest period for which statistical information is available, the average length of time cancer patients waited before receiving radiotherapy treatment in Wales was 15·1 days for first treatment at Velindre hospital and 5·4 days for first treatment at Singleton hospital.

Information on patients from Wales who receive treatment at units in England is not held centrally.

The Welsh medical committee advisory group on cancer services has recently presented its report on cancer services in Wales and this is presently being studied.

Forms (Bilingual Format)

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales which circulars, regular reports or regular forms requiring information, that are sent by the Welsh Office to local authorities in Wales, are printed in a bilingual format.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: There are 35 bilingual forms or other documents which are regularly sent by the Welsh Office to local authorities in Wales.

Details of these are shown in the following list:

Special Education

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he is satisfied with the progress that has been made in relation to integration of those with special education needs into ordinary schools and colleges; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: It was envisaged by the Warnock committee that full implementation of its recommendations on integration would take at least until the end of this century. Nevertheless, all Welsh local education authorities are now implementing the provisions of the Education Act 1981, although progress will vary between authorities.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many children in Wales assessed as needing special education were awaiting day places and boarding places at special schools at January 1986, or the latest date at which the information is available.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: There were 295 awaiting places at January 1985.

Peripatetic Teachers

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing how many full-time peripatetic teachers were working for each local education authority in Wales at January 1986, the number shared with other authorities and the number of part-time peripatetic remedial teachers.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information in respect of peripatetic remedial teachers is not yet available for January 1986. However, the numbers in January 1985 are as follows. None of these teachers was shared with another authority.

	Full-time	Part-time
Clwyd	36	29
Dyfed	26	—
Gwent	—	24
Gwynedd	10	—
Mid Glamorgan	78	37
Powys	33	—
South Glamorgan	8	—
West Glamorgan	47	28

Handicapped Children

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing how many children in secondary schools in Wales are recognised by the relevant local education authority as being handicapped; of these how many attend designated special classes or units on a full-time/part-time basis; and how many did not attend designated special classes at January 1986, or the latest date for which the information is available.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information in the form requested is not available. Figures to be published shortly in "Statistics of Education in Wales" indicate that the number of pupils who were receiving special education in ordinary or special classes in maintained secondary and primary schools in Wales under the provisions of the Education Act 1981 totalled 6,400.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many handicapped pupils registered in January 1986 with local education authorities in Wales as having a need for special education are attending special schools outside Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information for January 1986 is not yet available. At January 1985, 103 were doing so.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will issue guidelines to local education authorities in Wales to ensure that education facilities for mentally handicapped children give due regard to the home language of such children.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: It is for local education authorities to consider the pattern of education in their area and to determine placements for mentally handicapped children which best suit their educational needs.

Overseas Students

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing the number of overseas students enrolled in full-time, part-time and sandwich courses in each of the colleges of further education in Wales as of November 1985.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Information for November 1985 is not available. Figures for November 1984 are as follows:

Number of overseas students

	Number
North East Wales Institute of Higher Education	136
Llandrillo Technical College	22
College of Librarianship, Wales	49
Trinity College	22
Newport College of Further Education	10
Gwent College of Higher Education	41
Crosskeys College	13
Ystrad Mynach College of Further Education	14
Polytechnic of Wales	303
South Glamorgan Institute of Higher Education	60
Rumney College	58
Barry College of Further Education	54
West Glamorgan Institute of Higher Education	122
Neath College	31
Others*	15

* There were eight colleges each with fewer than ten overseas students.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Further Education

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of children remained at (a) maintained schools, (b) independent schools and (c) further education establishments in the academic years 1981-82 to 1984-85 in each local education authority in England, and in England as a whole at 16 years and 17 years.

Mr. Chris Patten: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State gave him on 21 January 1986, at columns 157-64, for information for the academic years 1979-80 and 1984-85. My hon. Friend will write to the hon. Member with figures for the remaining years on the same basis. Figures for pupils at independent schools cannot be given because information about their local education authority of normal residence is not collected centrally.

Physical Education

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will undertake a fundamental review of the role of physical education within the primary and secondary school curriculum.

Mr. Chris Patten: My right hon. Friend has no plans to do so.

Students

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he is satisfied that existing provisions for university and college students are adequate to ensure that no student who can benefit from such education will be deprived of the opportunity for financial reasons.

Mr. Chris Patten: There are now more students in higher education than ever before and the percentage of young people involved is the highest ever. Moreover, our awards system is more generous than those of other developed countries: no other country provides mandatory grant support at a similar level or devotes as high a proportion of its gross national product to student support as we do.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will take steps to ensure that the minimum weekly grant income for subsistence purposes of a student aged 18 years and over following a full-time course in education is at least £23·60 per week, and for students aged 16 and 17 years at least £18·20 per week.

Mr. Walden: Students on mandatory and full value discretionary awards currently receive, subject to a means test, £53·70 per week in term time. To extend the grant system so that all students over 18 in England and Wales received £23·60 per week and all students aged 16 and 17 received £18·20 would cost in the region of an additional £480 million per annum.

University Lecturers

Mr. Wainwright asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has about the numbers of university lecturers with a doctor's degree in scientific and mathematics subjects leaving their posts and giving as the reason for their decision higher salaries and better promotion prospects in industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: Information in the form requested is not available. In the year ending 31 December 1984 1,269 staff* were lost to universities of which retirement and death accounted for 601. Of the remaining 668, 227 had qualifications in pure science (biology and physical sciences), engineering, mathematics and computer science; and 68 left for posts in industry and commerce.

In the same year universities recruited 997† staff: of these 401 had qualifications in pure science (biology and physical sciences), engineering, mathematics and computer science; and 85 were recruited from industry and commerce.

Notes:

* Non-clinical academic staff, wholly paid from university funds and employed as assistant lecturers, lecturers, senior lecturers, readers and professors in Great Britain universities.

† Excluding 86 who were transferred from short term contracts to the staffing complement.

Super-Computers

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he proposes to seek to impose a ban on all contacts between United Kingdom academics using super-computer facilities at United Kingdom universities and their colleagues in the 19 countries embargoed by the United States of America, and identified as such to his officials, in the new regulation for the use in the United Kingdom of super-computers of United States origin; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: No.

Centre for Information on Language Teaching and Research

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the outcome of the review of the Centre for Information on Language Teaching and Research which he announced on 12 July 1985.

Sir Keith Joseph: In the light of many constructive responses to the Department's consultation, I have written to the chairman of CILT proposing a framework for its work aimed at strengthening its impact, particularly in the schools sector, and inviting him to take specific action to translate this framework into a programme of work. CILT's governing body has considered these proposals and agreed that they should form the basis of the organisation's future activities. Copies of the exchange of correspondence have been placed in the Library.

I am grateful to the chairman and members of the governing body for the time and effort they have given to the work of CILT and to those bodies which responded to the consultation.

Council for Educational Technology

Dr. Hampson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has yet reached decisions on the Council for Educational Technology following the review of its activities completed in 1985.

Sir Keith Joseph: I have written today to the CET and I am placing a copy of my letter and the review in the House of Commons Library.

EMPLOYMENT

Job Creation

Mr. Lawler asked the Paymaster General how many new jobs have been created in Bradford since December 1982 by people becoming self-employed.

Mr. Lang: I regret that the information requested is not available from the Department's statistics.

For areas smaller than regions, the only source of information on the number of persons who are self-employed is the decennial census of population. The 1981 census identified 17,023 such persons resident in Bradford.

Restart Scheme

Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General what arrangements the Manpower Services Commission has made to monitor and evaluate the restart scheme.

Mr. Lang: Detailed arrangements for the monitoring and evaluation of the restart programme have yet to be finalised. However, the Manpower Services Commission will be examining:

(a) what help was provided to long-term unemployed people through counselling

(b) the effectiveness of the new restart courses

(c) the effectiveness of the new jobstart allowance (by independent survey).

Mr. Pike asked the Paymaster General what criteria will be taken into account in judging the success of the restart scheme.

Mr. Lang: Criteria that will be taken into account in judging the success of the restart scheme will include the extent to which long-term unemployed people are helped to make progress towards leaving unemployment either directly into jobs (with or without the help of the jobstart allowance) the community programme or self-employment (for example, using the enterprise allowance scheme), or indirectly by attending job clubs or restart courses to help them improve their job search techniques.

Prison Visitors

Mr. Waller asked the Paymaster General if he will introduce legislation to amend section 29 of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 so as to entitle members of boards of prison visitors to take time off during working hours to perform their duties as prison visitors; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: No. I am afraid that increasing the range of circumstances in which employers are obliged by law to give time off could increase the burdens on employers and have an adverse impact on their ability to provide employment. This small change could give rise to pressure for others and I am not aware of any evidence that such legislation is needed to enable boards of prison visitors to fulfil their duties effectively.

Vocational Qualifications

Mr. Chope asked the Paymaster General what progress has been made by the working group on the review of vocational qualifications.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The group's report was submitted to my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Employment, and my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Education and Science and for Wales, and to the chairman of the Manpower Services Commission, on 23 April. The report is published today, and a copy has been placed in the Library of the House. We are most grateful to the chairman, Mr. H. G. de Ville, and the members of his group for the speed and thoroughness with which they have discharged their remit. We are now urgently considering their recommendations, and will announce our conclusions as soon as possible.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Legal Aid

Mr. Sims asked the Attorney-General if he is satisfied that the Law Society receives sufficient funds to administer the legal aid scheme without undue delay.

The Attorney-General: Yes. The cash limit for legal aid administration for 1986-87 is £24·6 million, an increase of 20 per cent. on the figure for the previous year.

Mr. Sims asked the Attorney-General what information he has as to the average time lapse between a solicitor applying for payment in respect of legal aid work undertaken and payment of fees.

The Attorney-General: Comprehensive information on the time taken to process and pay legal aid bills is not available. However, the Law Society recently undertook a sample survey of bills paid during February 1986 in certain area offices from which the following average figures were derived.

	Weeks
Civil legal aid:
(a) taxed bills	Five
(b) Regulation 100 bills	Six
Green Form Bills	Four
Assistance by way of Representation bills	Nine
Criminal legal aid in Magistrates' Courts bills	Seven

In all cases these figures represent the length of time from receipt of the bill by the Law Society to authorisation of payment by the area office. In the case of civil legal aid taxed bills the figure does not include the length of time taken on taxation.

Payment of bills relating to criminal legal aid in the higher courts is the responsibility of the courts and not the Law Society. Well over 90 per cent. of these bills are paid within four weeks of the claim being lodged.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Crown Agents

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the 1985 annual report and accounts of the Crown Agents for Overseas Governments and Administrations will be published.

Mr. Raison: The 1985 report and accounts are being published tomorrow and copies have been laid before the House. I am arranging for copies to be placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

United Nations General Assembly

Dame Judith Hart asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has yet determined which Ministers will attend the special session on the critical economic situation in Africa of the General Assembly from 27 to 31 May; and for how long.

Mr. Raison [pursuant to his reply, 30 April 1986, c. 421]: The Foreign and Commonwealth Secretary plans to attend the United Nations special session on Africa on 28 May. I shall lead the British delegation for the remainder of the time.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prisoners (Disciplinary Proceedings)

Mr. Kilroy-Silk asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners in Wandsworth and Featherstone prisons, respectively, were disciplined for (a) assaults on prison officers and (b) assaults on other prisoners in each of the last five years.

Mr. Mellor: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Local Radio

Mr. Temple-Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is considering the publication of a Green paper on local radio.

Mr. Giles Shaw: My right hon. and learned Friend the then Home Secretary announced last year that he proposed to publish a Green Paper this summer identifying the broadcasting policy issues raised by the forthcoming experiment in community radio, including the possible implications for existing local radio services, and inviting comments on a range of possible responses. When that announcement was made it was envisaged that the experimental community radio stations would by then have been operating for some months. It has since become increasingly clear, partly because of the significance community radio is likely to have for the existing framework for the provision and regulation of radio broadcasting, that it would make good sense for the Green Paper to look not only at community radio, but also at the future of radio services as a whole of which community radio may form a significant part. It has also become clear that if experience of the experiments is to inform the consultative process, then a later date of publication would be needed, and this will also allow reference to be made to the report of the Peacock committee, publication of which is expected in the summer.

Dog Fighting

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement as to what steps he is taking to seek to increase the penalties for those found guilty of offences involving dog fighting.

Mr. Mellor: The Government share the public abhorrence of all acts of cruelty against domestic and captive animals. The sentence to be imposed in any particular case is a matter for the court concerned and not one in which it would be proper for the Government to intervene. We keep under review the maximum level of the penalties provided for offences under the present law, and are looking at the matter again in the context of a Bill proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway).

News International Plant, Wapping

Mr. Dicks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the cost of policing the demonstrations and pickets at the News International plant, Wapping.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Dicks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers have been injured as a result of incidents in and around the News International plant, Wapping; and what measures have been taken to give protection to police officers assigned to these duties.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Three hundred and four, up to 4 May. The usual protective equipment has been available.

Mr. Dicks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the impact on crime prevention and detection in London of the recent need to send additional police officers into the Wapping area.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The need for officers to be deployed in this way is regrettable and must have an effect on the service which the police are able to provide elsewhere. I understand from the Commissioner that the precise effect on other crime duties is unlikely to be quantifiable.

Mr. Dicks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers have had to be taken away from their normal duties elsewhere in London to provide support to the local division at Wapping.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand that over 350,000 police man hours have been spent at or near the News International plant in connection with the industrial dispute there, but information distinguishing those officers who would otherwise have been on duty elsewhere is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The total number of officers involved in the police operation at Wapping has varied from day to day. On Saturdays (the day on which the largest demonstrations have taken place each week) this has ranged from 268 officers (on 8 February) to 1,870 officers (on 5 April). I understand from the Commissioner that 1,744 officers were deployed at the most recent demonstration on 3 May; of these 1,665 officers were from outside the Newham district.

Pharmacies

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many burglaries of local pharmacies involving the theft of drugs have taken place in each of the last five years.

Mr. Mellor: This information is not collected centrally on a regular basis. However, information collected in 1981 from 26 police forces in England and Wales suggested that there were nearly 600 burglaries in pharmacies recorded in these forces involving the loss of controlled drugs ("Reducing Burglary: a Study of Chemists' Shops"—Crime Prevention Unit—Paper 1).

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what special advice on security is issued by his Department or chief officers of police to the owners or operators of local pharmacies.

Mr. Mellor: The requirements for security of drugs controlled under the Misuse of Drugs Act are contained in the Misuse of Drugs (Safe Custody) Regulations 1973. No specific guidance on security is issued by the Home Office or the police to persons conducting retail pharmacy businesses, but police crime prevention officers and chemist inspecting officers regularly give advice during their visits to pharmacies. In assessing the adequacy of their security arrangements, retail pharmacists are also urged to take account of the recommendations of the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs in its report of 1983 on the security of controlled drugs. If the hon. Member has a specific case causing him concern, I should be pleased to look into it.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Financial Services Bill

Mr. Hanley asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received about possible changes to the provisions of the Financial Services Bill relating to self-regulating organisations, or to rules made by a designated agency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: I have received a large number of representations, in particular about these provisions of the Financial Services Bill. In response to these representations it is the Government's intention to bring forward at Report stage amendments to give effect to the following changes.

The first change concerns the liability of self-regulating organisations to suit for damages. I have sympathy with a number of the concerns expressed. The organisations might be reluctant to take the necessary disciplinary action against their members if there was a prospect of facing a number of large claims for damages which would be costly and time-consuming to defend. Similar problems could arise when applicants for membership were rejected. I am equally concerned that individuals might be reluctant to serve on the governing bodies of self-regulating organisations or to be employed by them if they too could be sued.

The Government have therefore decided to provide immmunity from actions for damages for self-regulating organisations recognised under the Financial Services Bill. This would be modelled broadly on the immunity which the Bill already confers on the designated agency and on the stock exchange in its capacity as competent authority for listing.

The immunity would apply to recognised self-regulating organisations, to the members of their governing bodies and to their officers and servants. They would not be liable for damages for anything done or omitted in the discharge of the functions of the recognised self-regulating organisation, unless they could be shown to have acted in bad faith.

However, this does not remove all legal remedies, but only the right to claim damages. The right to sue for a declaration setting out the position on any legal issue in dispute or for an injunction restraining an illegal act or requiring the self-regulating organisation to act lawfully will remain.

Although these provisions will limit the right of action through the courts, other remedies will be available. An investor who has suffered loss as a result of a business breaching the rules will be able to sue the business, or claim on the compensation arrangements required to be set up by the Financial Services Bill. A business which claims to have been dealt with unfairly by the self-regulating organisation will be able to invoke its appeal procedure, and if deprived of members it will also be able to apply for direct authorisation from the designated agency.

The second change would give the Secretary of State a power, which he could transfer to a designated agency, to alter the rules of a recognised self-regulating organisation. The power would allow the designated agency to act swiftly, but allow its decision to be challenged by the self-regulating organisation concerned in a way which other decisions under the Bill cannot be. The designated agency would be able to exercise its powers if at any time it believes that an organisation's rules fail to provide investors with protection equivalent to that provided by the agency's own conduct of business rules. This could be either because the organisation had not amended its rules in line with a new rule introduced by the agency or because in changed circumstances the organisation's rules no longer provide equivalent protection. The agency would have to consult the organisation before imposing a rule change on it, but there would be no minimum period of consultation.

If a rule change were imposed, it would then be open to the organisation concerned to challenge the agency's actions in the courts. It could do so either on the basis that the organisation's original rules did in fact provide the requisite level of investor protection; or on the basis that, while some change was agreed to be necessary, the requisite level of investor protection would have been achieved by an alternative rule proposed by the organisation. If the court were satisfied on either ground it could set aside the agency's alteration and substitute any alteration proposed by the organisation. The agency's rule, however, would continue to apply while this appeal process was being pursued. I believe that this proposal adequately meets the concerns which have been expressed on all sides.

The third change concerns the agency's own rules, against which the rules of the self-regulating organisations will be measured. The Securities and Investmens Board is already engaged in widespread consultation on draft rules, and its eventual proposals will be submitted to me. If I then transfer powers to the board, but it subsequently wishes to alter those proposals, it will now be required by the Financial Services Bill to undertake consultation. In this way the self-regulating organisations and other people affected will be able to comment on the agency's rules as they develop to meet changing circumstances.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Balance of Trade

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what effect the exchange rate has had on the United Kingdom balance of trade in manufactures since the first quarter of 1979; and if he will publish a table in the Official Report showing exports of manufacturers as a percentage of imports for trade with the United States, the European Economic Community and West Germany together with the relative export prices in each case for each year since 1970 and the current year to date.

Mr. Alan Clark: The balance of trade in manufactures depends upon many factors in addition to sterling exchange rates. The depreciation in the latter since 1979 has had a positive effect on the balance.

The statistical information requested is in the following table.

	*United Kingdom Export-Import Ratios			United Kingdom Relative Export Prices†

Monopolies and Mergers

Mr. Wrigglesworth asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if in conducting his review of monopolies and mergers policy, he will consider whether companies mounting takeover bids should be prohibited from offering for public sale subsidiaries of their targets.

Mr. Howard: In assessing whether a merger or merger proposal should be referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission for further investigation the Director General of Fair Trading and, subsequently, my right hon. Friend, take into account all aspects of the merger, including any future plans of the parties such as disposals. Each case is considered individually, on its own merits, and there is no presumption that such proposals are objectionable.

US (Trade Talks)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will make a statement outlining the further restrictions which were placed on the import of agricultural products from the United States of America to Spain and Portugal in consequence of the Accession of Spain and Portugal to the European Economic Community; and what estimate he has made of the value of the trade affected by these restrictions;

(2) if either Her Majesty's Government or the European Economic Community Commission sought the opinion of the general agreement on tariffs and trade on whether the imposing of quotas on oilseed imports to Portugal from the United States of America and the requirement that Portugal purchases 15·5 per cent. of its grain from the European Economic Community, in consequence of the Accession of Portugal to the European Economic Community, were consistent with the terms and obligations of that Agreement prior to the imposition; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The accession to the Community of Spain and Portugal will lead, over a transitional period, to the progressive adoption by both countries of the Community's common customs tariff and the common agricultural policy. As a result, restrictions imposed by Spain and Portugal on trade with countries outside the Community will be reduced in some cases and increased in others. The details are set out in the Treaty of Accession, a copy of which is in the Library.

The GATT permits such adjustments where they arise out of the formation or enlargement of a customs union provided that the resulting protection is not on the whole higher or more restrictive than before. The GATT also provides for the negotiation of compensation to trading partners when this condition is not met.

The Community is fully satisfied that the enlargement arrangements comply with GATT commitments. The Community was not required to seek the opinion of the GATT secretariat. The GATT provides procedures which should be used for the investigation and settlement of any disputes which arise.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the outcome of his recent talks with United States Trade Ministers.

Mr. Channon: I discussed a wide range of trade issues with members of the United States Administration, including objectives for the new GATT round and the current dispute between the Economic Community and United States over the enlargement of the European Community.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the European Economic Community is seeking to negotiate compensation to the United States of America in respect of the loss of trade rights and injury to the United States of America stemming from the levies placed on corn and sorghum imports from the United States of America to Spain in consequence of Spain's accession to the European Economic Community; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Community began negotiations with the United States in Geneva on 2 May to establish, in accordance with the provisions of the general agreement on tariffs and trade, what compensation if any is due. Meanwhile, the United States Administration have complained about some aspects of enlargement and threatened to take unilateral action not in accordance with GATT procedures against Community exports. The Community is seeking to dissuade the Administration from any such action. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry reinforced this message in Washington last week and made it clear that the Community would have to respond in kind to any United States action.

ECGD (Bank Guarantee Scheme)

Mr. Gould asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what arrangements have been made by the Export Credits Guarantee Department with the London and Scottish clearing banks, as represented by the Export and Shipbuilding Finance Committee, concerning the past operation of the comprehensive bank guarantee (open account) scheme and in particular, deficit payments and interest subsidies payable to the banks under the scheme.

Mr. Alan Clark: Under the comprehensive bank guarantee (open account) scheme, a bank makes advances against an exporter's own promissory notes to finance his exports made on an open account or similar basis. Repayment by the exporter of those advances is guaranteed by the Export Credits Guarantee Department. No interest subsidies are payable to the bank under this scheme.

As my right hon. Friend the then Minister of Trade announced on 24 October last, at column 200, the scheme is being phased out by 31 October 1987. This decision was reached after consulting users and other interested parties, including the clearing banks.

Computers (Government Support)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he proposes to take to ensure that the owners of computers already installed in the United Kingdom continue to receive the hardware and software support for which the suppliers contracted, in cases where the Government of the supplier country is seeking to attach conditions to the provision of such support; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: My Department is willing to take up such cases with supplier country authorities as necessary.

London University (Computer)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list in full and place in the Library the conditions which the United States Government is seeking to impose in return for supplying a super-computer to London university; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: I see no need to place in the Library a copy of proposals relating to a commercial contract.

PRIME MINISTER

Greenock and Port Glasgow

Q21. Dr. Godman asked the Prime Minister if she plans to visit Greenock and Port Glasgow in the near future.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

United States Bases

Q91. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister what plans she has to update the Attlee-Truman agreements on United States bases in Britain.

The Prime Minister: None. The Government are satisfied with the existing understandings which, as recent events have demonstrated, work well.

EC (Intergovernmental Agreement)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister whether the 1984 European Economic Community intergovernmental agreement was registered with the United Nations secretariat under article 102 of the United Nations Charter; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: No. The responsibility for registering the 1984 intergovernmental agreement with the United Nations lies with the Council Secretariat.

IRA (United States Donations)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister what is her estimate of the amount of money collected for the Irish Republican Army in the United States during the Reagan Administration.

The Prime Minister: I have nothing to add to the answer my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) on 28 April at column 291.

Small Businesses

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Prime Minister if she will list those Government measures of particular help for small businesses since 1979.

The Prime Minister: Measures introduced since 1979 to help small firms include the business expansion scheme which increases the supply of finance for investment in unquoted companies, the loan guarantee scheme which has recently been extended for a further three years and the enterprise allowance scheme which assists unemployed people to start up their own business and has been extended to provide 86,000 places in 1986-87 and 100,000 in each of the following two years. In addition, we have just launched a small firms merit award for research and technology (SMART) as a pilot scheme to stimulate innovation in small firms.

The Manpower Services Commission provides a range of small business training courses at a cost of £20 million in 1986-87.

Advice and counselling services have been greatly extended through the Government's small firms service and development of local enterprise agencies which now number more than 300. Under the local enterprise agency grant scheme, £2·5 million is available in 1986-87 to support such agencies in England.

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Prime Minister if she will list those Government measures of particular help to small business which are the subject of current legislation or are planned.

The Prime Minister: The Finance Bill will include a number of tax changes helping small firms, including the indefinite extension and improvement of the business expansion scheme and more favourable tax arrangements for recipients of the enterprise allowance. Also the Department of Trade and Industry has announced that later this year it will introduce an advisory service to help small and medium sized firms to improve their marketing.

Terrorism

Mr. Amess asked the Prime Minister if the Government are considering the formation of a formal multinational counter-terrorist unit both at an intelligence and commando level.

The Prime Minister: We are not considering the formation of such a unit. We believe the most effective and practical way in which to counter international terrorism is through closer co-operation between Governments and their police forces and security authorities. Considerable progress has been made recently to this end both with our European Community partners and with other like-minded countries.

Mr. Murphy asked the Prime Minister if she will make a response on behalf of Her Majesty's Government to the initiative by the president of the Western European Union Assembly for a European Group to co-ordinate the fight against terrorism.

The Prime Minister: I welcome the interest shown by the president of the Western European Union Assembly in combating the scourge of terrorism. As my hon. Friend will know, the actions of European Governments against terrorism are being co-ordinated amongst the Twelve. This forum includes all WEU member states and ensures the widest possible co-ordination of the European response to the terrorist outrage.

Libya

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister whether the Government will pay compensation to the families of British citizens allegedly killed in the middle east in reprisal for the American attack on Libya.

The Prime Minister: I regret that this is not possible. It has never been the practice of the British Government to make such payments. The murder of British citizens by terrorists is a matter of very deep regret, but we will not be deterred by threats of reprisals from our efforts to combat terrorism.

Seed Certification Standards

Mr. Steel asked the Prime Minister if she is satisfied with the co-ordination of the policies of the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, and the Secretary of State for Scotland in respect of the different interpretation of European Economic Community seed certification standards in England and Scotland.

The Prime Minister: There is no difference within Great Britain in the interpretation of EEC seed regulations and the departmental certifying authorities north and south of the border work to a common set of statutory prescribed standards.

Engagements

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 8 May.

Mr. Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 8 May.

Mr. Flannery asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 8 May.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 8 May.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today, including one with the Prime Minister of Sri Lanka.

Ionising Radiations

Mr. Dobson asked the Prime Minister which Minister is responsible for the health aspects of ionising radiations.

The Prime Minister: General responsibility for the health of the population in England rests with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services. The Secretary of State for the Environment and Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food have specific responsibilities for air, water and food. In discharging these responsibilities, they receive medical advice from the Government's Chief Medical Officer. In Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, all responsibilities rest with the appropriate Secretary of State.

Nuclear Fallout

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Prime Minister if, pursuant to the reply of 6 May to the hon. Member for Stockton North, she will specify the precise documentary forms in which the emergency plans and procedures for dealing with the threat from nuclear fallout exist; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Information and advice on the response to nuclear emergencies in peacetime and in war is contained in the "Emergency Planning Guidance to Local Authorities", a copy of which is in the Library. Information is also issued by the Health and Safety Executive in its booklet "Emergency Plans for Civil Nuclear Installations".

More detailed plans and procedures are formulated and held at local level.

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Prime Minister if she will take steps to make available to members of the public a document containing the Government's advice as to the precautions and protective measures to be taken when the threat of nuclear fallout, whether from civil or military sources, is imminent or present; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is preparing general public information material about civil defence which will be issued later this year. As to peacetime incidents, the Government will give detailed advice in response to any specific incident that may occur, and I refer the hon. Gentleman to the Secretary of State for the Environment's statement on 6 May at column 21.

London University (Computer)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Prime Minister who will be responsible for vetting and monitoring academic end users of the proposed London university super-computer; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The question of conditions governing access to United States super-computers to be used for academic research in the United Kingdom is to be discussed with the United States authorities.

Top Salaries Review Body (Report)

Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Prime Minister when she expects to receive the Top Salaries Review Body report; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have received the report of Top Salaries Review Body. An announcement will be made in due course.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Prime Minister why, pursuant to her reply to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), Official Report, 18 April, column 525, on plutonium use, Her Majesty's Government's policy in answering such questions has altered since 4 February 1983.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to the answer, 6 May 1986, c. 3]: It is the convention that Ministers are answerable in Parliament only for matters falling within the period of responsibility of the Administration of which they are members.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Prime Minister if she will describe the role of each Department concerned in the United Kingdom nuclear weapons programme.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to the answer, 6 May 1986, c. 3]: The Ministry of Defence is concerned with the research and development, procurement, production, deployment, safety and maintenance of nuclear weapons. The Ministry of Defence and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office are jointly responsible for the nuclear element of British defence policy. Additionally, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, in consultation with the Ministry of Defence, is responsible for arms control issues, including those concerning nuclear weapons. Other Departments are indirectly involved in the course of fulfilling their normal administrative functions.

SCOTLAND

Soviet Nuclear Accident

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he is taking regularly to monitor radioactivity levels in the light of the Chernobyl incident; what steps he has taken to inform and protect the public in the present situation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: In addition to the continuous regular monitoring which is carried out by the National Radiological Protection Board, the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority, the nuclear site operators and the regulatory bodies, additional monitoring has been taking place in Scotland of milk samples from the following locations, ranging from the south of Scotland to Shetland. Monitoring began on 3 May and is now taking place at:

Aberdeen
Campbeltown
Castle Douglas Cumnock
Dalbeattie
Dumfries (two locations)
Edinburgh
Fenwick
Glasgow
Grantown-on-Spey
Mauchline
Nairn
Orkney
Shetland
Stornoway
Stranraer

Monitoring of the deposition of radioactive materials on grass, to estimate possible uptake by cattle, is being carried out in the south-west of Scotland, in four districts in the Dumfries and Galloway region and at Chapelcross. Samples are also being taken at Nairn and at Dounreay.

Analysis of water sampled over the weekend from reservoirs near Dumfries, in the Highland region and at Milngavie, indicated extremely low levels of iodine-131, within the range of 2-9 becquerels per litre. These are less than 1 per cent. of the level of 2,400 becquerels per litre at which action needs to be considered. At the request of the Scottish Office, all water authorities have sent further samples for analysis from a variety of sources used for public water supplies—reservoirs, lochs and rivers. The results from the first 15 of these again all show radioactivity levels well below 1 per cent. of the trigger levels. All but two are less than 4 becquerels per litre, with the other two less than 15. This confirms the advice previously given that water from such sources is safe to drink.

Air sampling is being carried out at the nuclear establishments at Dounreay, Chapelcross, Torness, and Hunterston, and also at Rosyth, Peterhead power station and Lerwick.

Scottish office officials have also been in regular touch with officials of the National Radiological Protection Board and MAFF and other Departments have had access to the results of all monitoring carried ou by the board in England and Scotland.

Samples are being taken of vegetables grown in Scotland to ascertain radioactivity levels. My hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for local government and the environment issued a statement on Friday, 2 May in which he drew attention to the monitoring of milk. He advised the public that milk supplies were safe to drink, but that information would be given if any abnormal radiation levels were detected: on Monday 5 May a further statement was issued by the Minister that, while radiation levels had risen during the weekend, the advice given on safety of milk remained valid.

Further statements reinforcing and amplifying this advice were given on 6 and 7 May. My hon. Friend also emphasised, in his statement of 5 May that water supplies from mains, springs, wells and streams had been affected to an insignificant extent.

The latest monitoring results available indicate that radioactivity levels of Iodine 131 in milk from samples analysed on 6 May ranged from 1 becquerel per litre in Shetland to 225 becquerel per litres in the Dalbeattie area. First results for samples analysed on 7 May ranged from 3 becquerel-litre in Shetland to 120 becquerel-litre in the Stranraer area.

Iodine 131 in analysis of rainwater samples indicate a strong downward trend in radioactivity levels in precipitation, which will be reflected in levels in public supplies in due course. The trend in concentration of Iodine 131 in air and grass samples has also shown a strong downward trend over the last few days.

Port environmental health officers have been advised that any consignments of fresh products (including vegetables, fruit, fish from Russian or Polish coastal waters and dairy products) exported from Russia or Poland on or after 26 April should be held for testing.

The Scottish Office arranged comprehensive briefings for the press on Tuesday 6 May and Wednesday 7 May, and has established a public information line at St. Andrew's House. The number of telephone inquiries has been running at the rate of about 100 an hour since the public information room opened on Tuesday 6 May. This service will be kept in operation as long as the demand requires.

Results of monitoring to date indicate that radioactivity in rainwater is falling, but the advice given by the NRPB on 5 May that fresh rainwater should not be drunk continuously should be followed for the present. This does not apply to water supplied from other sources.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, in his statement to the House on 6 May, set out the overall effects the radioactivity from Chernobyl on the United Kingdom and the measures taken in response to them. So far as Scotland is concerned, the general pattern as regards deposition of radioactivity has been similar to that in the northern parts of England and we do not expect the radioactive cloud to constitute a risk to the health of individuals. Monitoring will continue and the results be made available to the public and the House.

Asbestos

31. Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how he proposes to monitor the use made by licensing authorities of their powers under part II of the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985 in relation to the disposal in esturial waters of asbestos-contaminated material; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given to him on 14 April, at columns 262-63.

Woodlands

32. Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on recent developments in the promotion of woodlands and broadleaf trees.

Mr. John Mackay: On 24 July 1985 my right hon. Friend the Member for Ayr (Mr. Younger) announced the Government's new policy on broadleaves. This was followed by the introduction of the broadleaved woodland grant scheme by the Forestry Commission on 1 October 1985. More than 800 applications for entry to the scheme have already been approved, and we can expect to see a significant increase in the planting of broadleaves.

On 24 March 1986 my right hon. and learned Friend announced revised criteria to be followed by the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland in clearing farm land for forestry. From the agricultural point of view, this will mean that substantially more land will be potentially available for tree planting in Scotland.

Fair Wages Resolution

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the estimated number of jobs which have been created in Scotland as a direct result of the abolition of the fair wages resolution.

Mr. Allan Stewart: There is no information on the number of jobs created in Scotland as a result of the abolition of the fair wages resolution.

Earnings

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report (a) the latest estimates of the number of part-time female and male workers and (b) the estimated proportion of part-time male workers in Scotland being paid less than (i) £3 an hour and (ii) £2 an hour in April 1985.

Mr. Allan Stewart: There were estimated to be 410,000 part-time female employees in employment in December 1985. No comparable estimates are made for part-time male employees, and the latest estimate is 60,000 at the census of employment in September 1981. No detailed information is available on the earnings of part-time male employees.

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will publish (a) a table showing the proportion of full-time employees in Scotland who, in the New Earnings Survey 1985, are paid less than £50, £60, £70, £80, £90, £100, £110 and £120 a week, respectively, when overtime earnings are included and (b) a table showing the proportion of full-time employees in the same area who are paid less than £110 and £120 when overtime earnings are excluded, for all males and females, and sub-divided into non-manual and manual males and females.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The information requested is given in the tables.

(a) Percentage of employees with earnings, including overtime, less than:

£	per cent.
50	0·2
60	0·9
70	2·9
80	7·1
90	12·8
100	19·6
110	26·8
120	34·4

(b) Percentage of employees with earnings, excluding overtime, less than:

	£110	£120
Males
All	20·7	28·6
Manual	28·9	40·0
Non-manual	9·7	13·1
Females
All	54·5	65·8
Manual	76·7	86·3
Non-manual	47·2	59·0

The information in both tables relates to full-time employees on adult rates in April 1985, whose pay was not affected by absence during the survey pay period.

Young Workers

Mr. McTaggart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish in the Official Report the number of young workers in Scotland who (a) are currently covered by the YTS, (b) are currently covered by the young workers scheme subsidy and (c) are expected to be covered by the new workers scheme subsidy by the end of 1986.

Mr. Allan Stewart: At the end of March 1986, the latest date for which information is available, there were 31,487 young people in Scotland in training under YTS; currently there are 5,403 covered by the young workers scheme. It is estimated that some 10,000 young workers will be supported under the new workers scheme in Scotland by the end of 1986, but take-up will depend on employers' willingness to participate.

Matrimonial Interdicts

Mr. Maxton asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many matrimonial interdicts with powers of arrest attached have been delivered to the eight police forces in Scotland in terms of section 15(4) of the Matrimonial Homes (Family Protection) (Scotland) Act 1981 since its introduction on 1 September 1982 in total, to each force and in each year; and how many of the interdicts with attached powers of arrest have been recalled or terminated by divorce.

Mr. John MacKay: The numbers of matrimonial interdicts to which the power of arrest was attached that were notified to police forces in Scotland in the period 1982 to 1985 were as follows:

Force	1982	1983	1984	1985
Central Scotland	13	20	37	30
Dumfries and Galloway	Nil	4	5	7
Fife	2	15	33	34
Grampian	12	17	36	63
Lothian and Borders	15	40	96	154
Northern	8	16	20	34
Strathclyde	38	151	262	410
Tayside	*	*	*	*

* Figures not available for these years; but the number of interdicts currently in force is 147.

The reason for the recall of an interdict is not always given to the police, but available information is as follows:

Force	Number of recalls since 1982
Central Scotland	Twelve (in period from 1984 — earlier details not available): reasons unspecified
Dumfries and Galloway	No recalls notified
Fife	One: reason unspecified
Grampian	Sixteen, of which six were by reason of divorce
Lothian and Borders	Forty-one: reasons unavailable
Northern	Nine, of which two were due to divorce
Strathclyde	Ninty-one in period to 30 April 1986: reasons unavailable
Tayside	Figures not available

Atmospheric Radiation

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will state the levels of radioactivity in the atmosphere as monitored at locations within Highland region, Orkney and Shetland on each of 3, 4 and 5 May.

Mr. Ancram: Regular monitoring of radioactivity levels in air is undertaken at the Dounreay site of the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority. Results for Iodine 131 on 3, 4, and 5 May were 0·3 Becquerels per cubic metre, 1·7 Becquerels per cubic metre and 0·06 Becquerels per cubic metre respectively. Arrangements have been made for an air sample from Lerwick to be analysed, but the result is not yet available.

DEFENCE

Civilian Patients

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Defence what advice is available to civilian patients receiving treatment in military hospitals as to their rights to seek redress of grievances through the legal system if dissatisfied with the treatment received.

Mr. Lee: Arrangements have been made to publicise the complaints procedures more widely by issuing an explanatory booklet to patients. Advice on legal procedures can be obtained from the military hospitals or the Ministry of Defence.

Ulster Defence Regiment

Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Secretary of State for Defence for what purpose soldiers serving in the Ulster Defence Regiment are required to report the numbers and expiry dates of their passports.

Mr. Lee: The requirement for UDR personnel to report the number and expiry date of their passport is designed to provide a record that they are in possession of a current passport in view of the possibility that they may need to be sent overseas for short periods of training. All Army units are subject to the same requirement.

Northern Ireland

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about operations in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Stanley: Military operations are being carried out, in support of the Royal Ulster Constabulary's fight against terrorism, by the Royal Navy, Army and Royal Air Force. The Army element currently comprises 10 Regular battalions and 9 battalions of the Ulster Defence Regiment. A major contribution is also being made by various support elements, including the Royal Engineers.

The figures given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland on 1 May in reply to my hon. Friends the Members for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) and for Billericay (Mr. Proctor), at column 1091, reflect both the effectiveness of these operations and the skill, professionalism and commitment of all elements of the security forces in carrying out their difficult and dangerous duties.

Cruise Missiles

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether Her Majesty's Government have been asked by the United States Administration to sign a memorandum of agreement or understanding regarding the location of United States cruise missiles in Britain.

Mr. Stanley: The Government's decision on the location of ground-launched cruise missiles at RAF Greenham common and RAF Molesworth was announced to the House by the then Secretary of State for Defence on 17 June 1980. Detailed arrangements are set out, in a classified memorandum of understanding, which was a requirement of both Governments.

Type 2400 Submarine

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether there is an ordering pattern for the procurement of the new type 2400 diesel-electric Upholder class conventional submarine;

(2) what is the current projected timetable for the replacement of existing conventionally powered submarines by and with the T2400 Upholder class diesel-electric submarine; and whether it is still on schedule;

(3) if he still intends to replace existing Oberon class and Porpoise class conventional submarines with the T2400 diesel-electric Upholder class submarine.

Mr. Lee: It has been stated on previous occasions that the highly capable Upholder class of conventional diesel-electric powered submarines is planned to replace the older Oberon class. An order was placed in January for the first three follow-on vessels of this class. As I said on 16 January, at column 642, although no decisions have yet been taken on the timing of future orders for this class, I would hope that these orders would be placed in the early 1990s.

ALARM Missile

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether there is any delay in the development of the rocket system of the ALARM missile.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Yes. Some technical difficulties have been encountered, and the air weapons division of British Aerospace, as the prime contractor for the ALARM programme, is considering urgently how the problems might best be overcome.

Royal Ordnance plc

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence how much revenue he expects the share flotation of Royal Ordnance plc is likely to yield to the Exchequer.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The price obtainable will depend on a number of factors, such as the trading record and stock market conditions, at the time of the sale.

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the prospectus to be issued in line with the Government's intention to privatise the royal ordnance factories will contain a profit forecast for the next financial year.

Mr. Norman Lamont: On the assumption that a prospectus for Royal Ordnance is issued in mid-1986, a profit forecast for the next financial year would refer to calendar year 1987. It would be most unusual for any company to make a public profit forecast that far ahead and it is not expected that Royal Ordnance would do so.

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he intends to publish the prospectus offering for sale shares in Royal Ordnance plc.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The Government hope that the sale of Royal Ordnance could take place in mid-1986, but no date has yet been fixed.

End-user Certificates

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Defence what safeguards are taken to seek to ensure that end-user certificates for the export of small arms and ammunition are genuine.

Mr. Alan Clark: I have been asked to reply.

It would not be in the public interest to publish details of safeguards adopted in respect of end-user certificates or other documents which may be required in support of export licence applications.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Incident Statistics (RUC and Army Personnel)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish in the Official Report, a table showing, separately, for the year 1985, the number of incidents involving (a) Army personnel, (b) Royal Ulster Constabulary personnel and (c) both Army and Royal Ulster Constabulary personnel under the following headings (i) assaults, (ii) cases involving the use of firearms, (iii) traffic offences and (iv) others.

Mr. Scott: The information is not available in the form requested. The only available information relating to convictions in Northern Ireland of members of the Army and Royal Ulster Constabulary is as follows:

Offence	*Number of Convictions
	Royal Ulster Constabulary	Army
Assault	5	37
Involving use of firearms	2	11
Traffic	80	338
Other	9	n/a

* In some instances an individual was convicted of more than one offence arising out of the same incident.

Civil Servants

Mr. A. Cecil Walker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) whether Her Majesty's Government will publish the percentage of Northern Ireland civil servants (a) who were schooled outside Northern Ireland and (b) about whom no schooling classification could be ascertained despite being educated within Northern Ireland;

(2) whether Her Majesty's Government will now provide a disaggregated breakdown of all civil servants recruited and promoted, on the basis of (a) since the inception of the schooling question and (b) thenceforward annually.

Dr. Boyson: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Berkshire East, (Mr. MacKay) on 10 February 1986, at columns 325-26.

Recruitment and promotion have been included in the monitoring arrangements, and when the results become available, these will be published in monitoring reports, which it is intended should be published annually.

Mr. A. Cecil Walker asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether Her Majesty's Government are willing to permit transferability on a voluntary basis between the Northern Ireland Civil Service and the Home Civil Service in the same way as is presently permitted between Departments within the Home Civil Service.

Dr. Boyson The Northern Ireland Civil Service and the Home Civil Service are separate services under the Crown. Although there are no formal arrangements for transfers between them, officers of either service can be attached to the other service on a temporary basis. A permanent transfer may be arranged on compassionate grounds where there are compelling welfare circumstances.

Intimidation

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many acts of intimidation have been reported since 1 January; in which cases these acts were against Protestants and in which cases against Catholics, showing what organisation was responsible where this is known; and how many people the incidents involved.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many acts of intimidation have been reported since 1 January that involved more than 10 people, specifying against whom the acts were perpetrated, what damage there was to property, what injuries there were, and whether the injured were Catholic or Protestant.

Mr. Scott: The information sought is not available.

ENERGY

Electricity Prices

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Energy by how much electricity prices have been raised in the latest five-year period; how this compares with the 1974-79 period; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: Between 1974 and 1979 the current price index for domestic electricity rose by 147 per cent. and that for industrial electricity by 116 per cent. In the latest five-year period for which data are available on a comparable basis—1980 to 1985—the corresponding figures were 43 per cent. and 32 per cent.

Windscale Plant (Fire)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what was the date and time of the commencement of the fire at the Windscale nuclear plant in 1957;

(2) what was the date and time at which the fire at the Windscale plant in 1957 was made public;

(3) when the full official report into the Windscale nuclear plant fire in 1957 was published;

(4) if he will place in the Library a copy of the full report into the Windscale fire in 1957.

Mr. Goodlad: The reports "Accident at Windscale No. 1 pile on 10th October 1957," Cmnd. 302, and "Final report of the Committee appointed by the Prime Minister to make a technical evaluation of information relating to the design and operation of the Windscale piles, and to review the factors involved in the controlled release of Wigner energy," Cmnd. 471, were presented to Parliament in November 1957 and July 1958, respectively. The former says that temperatures were increasing during 9 and 10 October 1957, and at 16.30 on 10 October visual inspection revealed uranium cartridges at red heat. The UKAEA advises me that a statement was issued by it at 13.00 on 11 October 1957, and that further statements were issued on 12, 13, 14 and 15 October.

Bradwell Nuclear Power Station

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) when the metal corrosion in Bradwell nuclear power station reactor cores was first observed;

(2) when the metal corrosion in Bradwell nuclear power station reactor core was first made public;

(3) when the full report into the corrosion in the reactor at Bradwell nuclear power station was published;

(4) if he will place in the Library a copy of the full report of the inquiry into metal corrosion in Magnox reactors.

Mr. Goodlad: I have asked the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board to write to the hon. Member.

Dungeness Power Station

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the accidental discharge of radioactive gas from Dungeness power station on 3 March 1986; and if he is satisfied with the publicity arrangements that are made for such incidents.

Mr. Goodlad: As I have informed my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), I am advised by the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate for the Health and Safety Executive that approximately 100 lb of slightly contaminated carbon dioxide was released following overheating of the pre-heater of a small separate plant which is attached to the Dungeness A power station for the purpose of treating carbon dioxide cooling gas.

The amount of radiation released in this incident (estimated at less than 25 micro-curies of sulphur 35) is only one sixtieth of the station's typical actual daily release of sulphur 35, itself regarded by the radiochemicals inspectorate as negligible, already permitted under the authorisation issued by the Secretary of State for the Environment. Typically such authorisations to stations of this type permit daily releases 10,000 times the amount released in this incident, although, of course, operators are required to keep releases as low as reasonably achievable. The incident caused no injury to or contamination of anyone on or off the site, and no danger to the reactor. The incident was, therefore, not formally reportable under the incident reporting arrangements announced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Moore) on 26 July 1982, although the NII and my Department were notified. It was also agreed as part of those arrangements that the NII and the operators at each site should inform the local population about any incidents which might have consequences outside the site. I am satisfied with the arrangements.

Nuclear Reactors

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the nuclear reactors in Britain (a) with secondary containment and (b) without secondary containment.

Mr. Goodlad: I am advised that secondary containments are not considered necessary, given all the other safety features, including the massive and very strong primary pressure containments, at the existing gas cooled, Magnox and AGR nuclear power stations.

However, secondary containment is an integral feature of the design of the steam generating heavy water reactor at Winfrith, and the Prototype fast reactor at Dounreay.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Energy when the Central Electricity Generating Board last made a safety assessment of a nuclear reactor of a type akin to that at Chernobyl; and when it was published.

Mr. Goodlad: I have asked the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board to write to the hon. Member.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Personal Pension Plans

Mr. Heddle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he proposes to make a statement on the eligibility of building societies to market personal pension plans.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) on 7 May at columns 132-33.

Gross Domestic Product

Sir David Price asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for each year from 1978 the percentage of gross domestic product represented by public sector activities and also the percentage represented by national and local taxation including national insurance contributions.

Mr. Moore: The information requested is as follows:

percentages of GDP

	*Public sector activities	Taxes including national insurance contributions and royalties†
1978	28	34
1979	27	35
1980	29	36
1981	30	38
1982	29	39
1983	28	39
1984	26	39
1985	n.a.	39

By convention, * is given as percentage of income GDP (at factor cost) † as percentage of GDP at market price.

"Public sector activities" represent the public sector's contribution to the national income, and exclude (for example) all transfers between the public sector and private sector.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Foreign Ministers Meeting

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the meeting of Foreign Ministers in Venice on 29-30 April under the auspices of the Western European Union.

Mr. Eggar: I have today placed in the Library of the House a copy of the communiqué issued after the meeting of WEU Foreign and Defence Ministers on 29-30 April at Venice. In fulfilment of the undertaking I gave in answer to my hon. Friend's question of 26 February I will shortly place in the Library of the House a copy of a report on the work of the Western European Union following the Rome declaration of October 1984.

Nigeria

Mr. Thornton: asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to urge the Nigerian Government to authorise the release and payment funds held in Nigeria which are owed to British subjects who were formerly employed by companies based in Nigeria; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: We take every suitable opportunity to remind the Nigerian authorities of the problem of personal remittances. Latterly, it was raised when my right hon. and learned Friend visited Lagos in September 1985 and during the Nigerian Foreign Minister's visit to Britain in January. The British High Commission in Lagos regularly pursues individual claims.

Fatah Supreme Military Council

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received from Her Majesty's ambassador in Amman about the meeting there on 28 April of the recently created Fatah Supreme Military Council, in opposition to Yasir Arafat, under the chairmanship of Atallah Muhammad Atallah; and what degree of Arab support this organisation is believed to have.

Mr. Renton: We have noted this meeting and Mr. Arafat's criticism of it, but have no evidence of the degree of Arab support for the new organisation.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which European Economic Community countries are fishing in Falkland waters; and what payments are being made by them.

Mr. Eggar: Vessels registered in Spain and Italy fish in Falklands waters: in addition, two British companies are involved in joint fishing ventures with companies from non-EEC states. Fees are payable in respect of harbour facilities and, with effect from 1 April, for trans-shipping and exporting operations carried out in Berkeley sound and territorial waters.

Agricultural Produce (Import Ban)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will seek to establish from the EEC Commission why the ban on imports of fruit, vegetables, meat and other agricultural produce from most Eastern bloc countries was not applied to East Germany; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The EC Commission has proposed that a temporary ban on the import of certain foodstuffs should apply to those countries falling within an approximate radius of 1000 km of Chernobyl, namely the USSR, Hungary, Poland, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Romania and Yugoslavia. The measure is not aimed against nor designed to exempt any particular country or region. It is a short term precautionary measure which would, if agreed, run until 31 May, subject to review both as regards country and product coverage in the light of the latest available scientific evidence.

Guatemala

Mr. Moynihan asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the United Kingdom's relations with Guatemala.

Mr. Eggar: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth East (Mr. Atkinson) on 28 April at column 291.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Pensions and Prices

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the percentage increase in the state retirement pensions and the pensioners' price index since: (a) 1983, (b) 1979, (c) 1974 and (d) 1970.

Mr. Major: The information requested is as follows:

Percentage increase

*Date	Retirement pension†		Pensioners' price index‡
	Single	Couple	One-person household	Two-person household
November 1970	666·0	656·8	412·3	410·0
July 1974	283·0	283·1	244·8	242·0
November 1979	64·4	64·3	56·2	55·9
November 1983	12·5	12·5	9·4	9·4

* The dates are dates of benefit upratings in the relevant years except for 1970 when no benefit uprating took place.
† Increase calculated to November 1985.
‡ The pensioners' price index is produced quarterly. The percentage increase is taken from the relevant quarter in the years listed to the fourth quarter of 1985.

Convalescent Facilities (Hampshire)

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make additional funding available to the Southampton and South-West Hampshire health authority in order to retain adequate convalescent facilities such as those provided at Fred Woolley house.

Mr. Whitney: It is for the district health authority to plan and manage local services, within the resources made available to it by the regional health authority, in the light of local needs and priorities. We understand that the authority decided on 28 April to retain convalescent facilities at Fred Woolley home and the Netley Castle convalescent home.

Health Notice (86)11

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what advice he gives to health authorities, local authorities, community health councils and family practitioner committees on photocopying health notice HN(86)11; and if he will permit any form of reproduction other than photocopying.

Mr. Whitney: Most departmental circulars are directed at health authorities and therefore bear an inscription that they may be freely copied by those authorities. The same rule would, of course, apply to other circulars, for example, HN(86)11, but to make the point even clearer future circulars will spell this out in more detail. There are no restrictions on the type of reproduction methods that may be used.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement regarding the impact of the changes introduced by health notice HN(86)11 upon central Government support for local authorities, including an estimate of the expected change in cash support arising from the action expected to be taken by individual authorities.

Mr. Whitney: The main change announced in HN(86)11 was the decision to permit extended periods of joint financing for the expansion of services for drug misusers. This means that health authorities will be able to make payments to local authorities, and to voluntary organisations, for up to 10 years at 100 per cent. of the cost and for 13 years in all, for a social services input to the development of services for drug misusers. Extra allocations of funds to regional health authorities totalling £5 million a year for the expansion of these services were announced in circular HC(86)3. We expect most of the extra funds to be allocated under the joint finance arrangements with a reasonable proportion being applied to local authority and voluntary sector projects. It is not possible at present to say more precisely what the total effect will be of the decisions about joint finance taken by individual district health authorities.

It is not anticipated that the changes in HN(86)11 will otherwise have any bearing on central Government support for local authorities. They were relatively minor changes. First, the conditions for making capital grants were eased so that the full repayment of grant is no longer required in all circumstances where the property ceases to be used for the intended purpose. Second, the pattern of payments can now be revised in later years within the total maximum period and there is scope for the Secretary of State to approve extended periods of payments to meet the full revenue cost of a project. Third, the wording of the conditions is clarified regarding the duty of health authorities to satisfy themselves that voluntary organisations receiving joint finance grants will meet continuing financial responsibilities as joint finance tapers off.

AIDS

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many requests for further information have been received in response to his Department's public information campaign advertisements on acquired immune deficiency syndrome; how many such requests have not been answered; what is the average delay before a request is answered; and if he will estimate the maximum delay in future in answering requests.

Mr. Hayhoe: There have been approximately 3,000 requests for the Health Education Council leaflet on AIDS. The average length of time taken to deal with these requests is three to four days, and there are none outstanding. It is expected that future requests will be dealt with in a similar time scale. In addition, health education units and other organisations have ordered bulk supplies of the leaflet from the Council totalling 220,000. The time scale for dealing with these requests is normally three weeks, and it is expected that future bulk orders will be dealt with in a similar time scale.

NHS Disciplinary Inquiries

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he plans to review the procedure for National Health Service disciplinary inquiries.

Mr. Hayhoe: I am considering carefully expressions of concern about the disciplinary inquiry procedure for hospital doctors.

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the number and estimated cost of National Health Service disciplinary inquiries for the 10 years to the most recent year for which figures are available.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that this information is not collected centrally.

Health Authorities

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will list payments by health authorities pursuant to section 28A of the National Health Service Act 1977 to local authorities other than those falling in part within the boundaries of the health district, broken down by health authority;

(2) if he will list in the Official Report all cases where a health authority is represented on a joint consultative committee for a geographical area which does not in part fall within the boundaries of that health district.

Mr. Whitney: The Department does not collect information about representation of joint consultative committees or about individual joint finance payments under section 28A.

Benefits (Coventry)

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many persons are in receipt of (a) supplementary benefit and (b) unemployment benefit in (i) the Coventry, North-East constituency and (ii) the city of Coventry; if he will list the categories under which benefit is claimed; and if he will give the equivalent figures for the past five years.

Mr. Major: Coventry is covered by two of the Department's local offices, Coventry (East) and Coventry (West), for supplementary benefit purposes and by five unemployment benefit offices in Coventry and one in Bedworth for unemployment benefit purposes. The boundaries of these offices are not conterminous with those of the Coventry North-East constituency or the city of Coventry.

Figures of people receiving supplementary benefit from both local offices at 11 February 1986, and at comparable dates for the last five years are as follows:—

	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985	1986
Persons under pension age excluding the unemployed	9,496	14,833	17,186	17,846	18,324	18,104
Unemployed persons*	5,424	6,296	7,860	9,537	10,675	11,214
Persons over pension age	11,056	11,093	11,302	11,198	11,235	11,008

* People in receipt of Unemployment Benefit and Supplementary Benefit are included in the total figure.
Source: 100 per cent. count of cases in action.

Figures of people receiving unemployment benefit from the unemployment benefit offices at November 1985—the latest available—and at comparable dates for the last five years are as follows:—

	*February 1982	November 1982	November 1983	*November 1984	November 1985
Persons in receipt of unemployment benefit only	8,164	7,253	5,794	n/a	4,750
Persons in receipt of unemployment benefit and supplementary benefit	2,550	2,250	2,016	n/a	1,471

* Figures for November 1981 and 1984 are not available because of a trade dispute.

NHS (Residential Property)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many times in the past six years he has been the plaintiff in a court action for possession of National Health Service residential property.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that this information is not held centrally.

Crown Immunity

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many times in the past six years he has invoked Crown immunity; and what was the nature of each case.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that this information is not held centrally.

Primary Health Care

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, pursuant to his Green Paper on primary health care, Cmnd. 9771, he will make a statement on the ways in which family doctors have a continuing responsibility for their patients.

Mr. Hayhoe: Under their terms of service, family doctors are responsible for providing their National Health Service patients with all necessary and appropriate personal medical services, and may do so either personally or by making other appropriate arrangements.

Iodate Tablets

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) who holds stocks of iodine tablets:

(2) how many iodine tablets are in stock per head of population and per head of population under the age of 18 years.

Mr. Whitney: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Patients

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the average number of patients on a general practitioner's list in each year since 1974.

Mr. Hayhoe [pursuant to his reply, 6 May 1986, c. 88]: The following is the information for unrestricted principal general medical practitioners in England:

Year	Number of patients
1974	2,384
1975	2,365
1976	2,351
1977	2,331
1978	2,312
1979	2,286
1980	2,247
1981	2,201
1982	2,155
1983	2,116
1984	2,089

ENVIRONMENT

Property Services Agency

Mr. Sumberg asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he proposes to change the way in which he receives private sector advice about the operation of the Property Services Agency.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Under present arrangements, I am advised by the chief executive of the PSA, who chairs the PSA board comprising his senior colleagues. In addition, the PSA advisory board comprising 11 persons from outside the Government has since 1980 reported direct to successive Secretaries of State on a wide range of key matters affecting the agency. I have concluded that it is now appropriate for private sector expertise to be more directly focused on the main issues which the agency faces. I have therefore decided to appoint three non-executive part-time members from outside the Government to the PSA board, and to discontinue the PSA advisory board. The chairman of the PSA advisory board, Mr. Nigel Mobbs (chairman and chief executive of Slough Estates plc) and his colleagues have welcomed my decision. I for my part have greatly valued, as have my three predecessors, the reports provided by the PSA advisory board. Their quality has been a material factor in persuading me to secure more immediate private sector involvement in the running of the PSA.

I am appointing to the PSA board for a period of one year Mr. B. J. Hill (chairman and chief executive of Higgs and Hill plc and a member of the PSA advisory board since 1980); for a period of two years Mr. H. L. Cousins (a partner in Price Waterhouse plc and a member of the PSA advisory board since 1985); and for a period of three years Mr. J. S. Brown, managing director of Peachey Property Corporation plc. These appointments commencing on 15 May 1986, will provide specialist outside advice in the fields of building, finance and estates respectively. Each non-executive member will be paid £4,000 per annum during the tenure of his appointment.

Radiation

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many incidents involving the pollution of water supplies by nuclear waste radiation have been recorded since 1979.

Mr. Waldegrave: No incidents involving the pollution of public water supplies by radioactive discharges have been reported to my Department since 1979.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will publish the level of radioactive traces in rainwater for each area of the United Kingdom for each day from 2 April to 7 April.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will ask the National Radiological Protection Board to publish all the detailed readings of radiation levels available to it over the past two weeks.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he has taken to monitor regularly radioactivity levels in the north of England and Scotland in the light of the Chernobyl incident; what steps he has taken to inform and protect the public in the present situation; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: I shall answer these questions shortly.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he intends to make available for public scrutiny, a permanent register of radioactive disposals which includes the classification of radioactive waste in terms of the degree of risk involved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government have accepted the broad thrust of the report of the inter-departmental working party of officials on "Public Access to Environmental Information". (Pollution Paper No. 23 (1986)). One of the recommendations of that working party was that powers should be sought, by legislation, to require public registers to be kept setting out information relating to certificates issued under the Radioactive Substances Act 1960 for disposal of radioactive waste. The Government intend to bring forward proposals on these lines after consultation with those most closely involved. The precise content of the register has yet to be determined.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on the problems the United States of America nuclear dumping sites have faced, with special references to the detection of radionuclides beyond the site boundaries.

Mr. Waldegrave: The officers of my Department are kept informed about relevant developments in the United States of America and elsewhere through personal contacts, attending conferences, articles in the technical press and papers in learned scientific journals.

I shall be visiting the radioactive waste disposal site at Barnwell, South Carolina on a forthcoming visit to the USA and Canada.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when the concept intermediate level waste was first used by the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive and his Department; how is it defined; and if the definition of low level waste will now be expanded.

Mr. Waldegrave: The concept of intermediate-level waste has been well established for many years; but a precise agreed definition came with the adoption by the Government, the waste producers and NIREX of the definition recommended by the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee in its fifth annual report in June 1984. This is that intermediate-level waste is waste with radioactivity exceeding the boundaries for low-level waste (4 GBq/tonne alpha or 12 GBq/tonne beta/gamma), but which does not require heating to be taken into account in the design of storage for disposal facilities.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the maximum half-life of waste considered to be low level.

Mr. Waldegrave: Low level radioactive waste is defined as that with less than 4 GBq per tonne of alpha-emitting radioactivity and less than 12 GBq per tonne of beta-gamma radioactivity. It would not be sensible to specify a maximum half-life for radioactivity in low level waste; naturally occurring trace amounts of uranium have a half-life of over four billion years and stable elements have an infinitely long half-life.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much low level intermediate waste is produced each year by the nuclear industry.

Mr. Waldegrave: United Kingdom reactors were expected to produce about 640 cubic metres of intermediate level waste and 5,300 cubic metres of low level radioactive waste in 1985. Fuel reprocessing operations in the same year were expected to produce about 970 cubic metres of ILW and 2,900 cubic metres of LLW.

The volume anticipated in future years are given in the "Summary report on the 1985 United Kingdom Radioactive Waste Inventory" (Report No.: DOE/RW/85-196).

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he intends the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive to be responsible for intermediate and high level nuclear waste.

Mr. Waldegrave: UK NIREX Ltd. is already responsible for the disposal of intermediate-level radioactive waste. The Environment Select Committee report recommended that it should have similar responsibility for heat generating waste also: this recommendation is being considered.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the same kind of soil and geological conditions are required for dumping of low level waste as for intermediate level waste.

Mrs. Rumbold: Trench disposal of low level waste would require geological conditions in which the water flow is low and the surrounding rocks provide a natural barrier to the migration of radionuclides. Trench disposal of short lived intermediate level waste would require the same conditions. Longer lived intermediate waste, for which deep disposal is used, requires similar conditions, but in addition the ground should be suitable for mining operations.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether, in view of the changed plans for dumping of nuclear waste, he will defer the date of laying the special development order;

(2) whether, in view of the decision to dispose of only low level nuclear waste at one of the four sites, he now intends to publish new informations to local authorities about quantities, transportation, method of dumping, safety, risk, and other characteristics of nuclear waste dumps.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall answer these questions shortly.

Houses (Multiple Occupancy)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 23 April, Official Report, column 166, when in May he expects to publish a circular on houses in multiple occupancy.

Sir George Young: DOE circular 12/86 is due to be issued to local authorities on 22 May and published on 28 May.

Radioactive Isotopes

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all types of radioactive isotopes traced at monitoring points in the United Kingdom by the National Radiological Protection Board since 1 May.

Mr. Waldegrave: The following radioactive isotopes have been detected at monitoring stations in the United Kingdom since 1 May 1986.

Iodine-131, Iodine-132, Ruthenium-103, Caesium-134, Caesium-136, Caesium-137, Tellurium-132, Barium-140, Molybdenum-99, Niobium-95 and Zirconium-95.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will ask the National Radiological Protection Board to make it its policy to publish the normal background radiation figures whenever publishing current readings.

Mr. Waldegrave: Relating levels of radiation and radioactivity to normal and natural background levels is not always practicable. When it is the National Radiological Protection Board does so.

Mr. Forman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has received any advice from the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee on the report of the Environment Committee on radioactive waste.

Mr. Waldegrave: Yes. I have received a letter from the chairman of RWMAC and have placed copies in the Library and the Vote Office.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Intervention Stores

1. Miss Maynard asked the Minister of Agricuture, Fisheries and Food what is the latest figures for the total value of agricultural produce in intervention stores in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Gummer: On 31 March the value of United Kingdom intervention stocks, calculated at March buying-in prices, was £1,368 million.

Badgers

8. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement about the future control of badgers.

Mrs. Fenner: My right hon. friend announced on 7 April that action on badgers would be confined to that part of the breakdown farm where it is believed that tuberculosis was transmitted to cattle, or to the whole farm if it is not possible to be more precise. A consequence of this change should be that fewer badgers will be killed.

Milk Quotas

9. Mr. Nellist asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has now calculated the percentage of the value of the milk quota which will be received on average by an outgoing tenant.

Mr. Jopling: I do not believe it would be meaningful to do so.

24. Mr. Cockeram asked the Minster of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what consultations he had before reaching his decision on the allocation of milk quota allocation between the landlord and the tenant.

Mr. Jopling: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales and I had consultations with the National Farmers Union, the Country Landowners Association, the Tenant Farmers Association, the Farmers Union of Wales, the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors, the Central Association of Agricultural Valuers, the Incorporated Society of Valuers and Auctioneers, the Agricultural law Association, the Milk Marketing Board, the Association of County Councils and the Association of Landowning Charities.

Fishing Industry

16. Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what consultations he has had with representatives of the fishing industry about Her Majesty's Government's plans to tax the supplies used by east European factory ships.

Mr. Gummer: The Government are well aware of the concern of the pelagic sector of the fishing industry at the proposal by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise to apply import duty to the supplies used by east European factory ships and this matter is currently under consideration.

Fish Quotas

18. Mr. Fisher asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to what extent United Kingdom fish quotas remain unused.

Mr. Gummer: The United Kingdom's quotas under the common fisheries policy for the Community's autonomous and joint stocks amounted to a total of 837,660 tonnes last year, of which 680,621 tonnes were taken. The United Kingdom's distant water quotas in the waters of certain third countries were for the most part substantially underused last year.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which European Economic Community countries have been allocated fishing quotas, and for what species, in Russian waters.

Mr. Gummer: None.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which European Economic Community countries have been allocated fishing quotas, and for what species, in Swedish waters.

Mr. Gummer: The information is set out in the annex to Council regulation (EEC) No. 3725/85 of 20 December 1985 which was published in the Official Journal of the European Communities No. L361 of 31 December 1985 and copies of which are available in the Library.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which European Economic Community countries have been allocated fishing quotas, and for what species, in Norwegian waters.

Mr. Gummer: The information requested on Norwegian exclusive stocks and certain joint stocks in the North sea is set out in the annexes to Council regulation (EEC) No. 3730/85 of 20 December 1985. For the remaining joint stocks in the North sea, there are limits on the quantity which may be fished in Norwegian waters: these limitations, however, are not separately allocated between member states. Information concerning these major North sea joint stocks is contained in Council regulation (EEC) No. 3721/85 of 20 December 1985. The above regulations were published in the Official Journal of the European Communities No. L361 of 31 December 1985, copies of which are available in the Library.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which European Economic Community countries have been allocated fishing quotas, and for what species, in Faroes waters.

Mr. Gummer: The information requested is set out in the annex to Council regulation (EEC) No. 3732/85 of 20 December 1985 which was published in the Official Journal of the European Communities No. L361 of 31 December 1985 and copies of which are available in the Library.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which European Economic Community vessels have been allocated fishing quotas, and for what species, in Greenland waters.

Mr. Gummer: The information requested is set out in the annex to Council regulation (EEC) No. 3783/85 of 31 December 1985 which was published in the Official Journal of the European Communities No. 363 of 31 December 1985 and copies of which are available in the Library.

Beef

19. Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the likely effect on the retail price of beef of an end to the beef variable premium scheme.

Mr. Gummer: During the recent CAP price-fixing negotiations, we were able to secure the continuation of the beef variable premium scheme when the maximum rate will, following the devaluation of the green pound, be 16·69 p/kg on eligible carcases at the deadweight stage. This is equivalent to rather over 10·5 p/lb at the retail level on beef from carcases which have benefited from the premium. The actual effect on retail prices does, however, depend upon butchers' pricing policies for the various types and cuts of meat.

Agricultural Development and Advisory Service

20. Mr. Cohen asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he plans any further cuts in the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service after April 1987.

Mr. Jopling: I have no present plans for reductions in the size of the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service (ADAS) beyond those announced in the written answer which I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) on 27 February.

Rural Economy

22. Mr. Hicks asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the contribution that agriculture is currently making to the rural economy.

Mrs. Fenner: Agriculture makes a substantial contribution to the economy amounting to £5,265 million as its share of gross domestic product in 1985.

The agreement on agricultural prices and related measures reached last month will enable the industry to sustain its major role in the rural economy while taking account of the need to adjust to the changing demands it has to meet.

EC Farm Budget

23. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate how much the European Economic Community will overspend in the current year on the farm budget.

Mr. Jopling: The Commission has indicated that a supplementary budget will be needed in 1986. This is in part because of additional expenditure on agriculture arisng from the decline in value of the dollar against the ecu and the realignment of European currencies. The Commission has said that it will propose an additional provision of 915 mecu to allow for these factors.

Horticultural Development Council

25. Sir John Wells asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action the Government will be taking following the vote in favour of a horticultural development council in the recent poll of growers.

Mrs. Fenner: Following the poll of growers, the results of which were announced on 4 April, my right hon. Friend and the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Wales have decided to proceed with arrangements for setting up a Horticultural Development Council for Great Britain. The council will have powers to raise a levy on sales of horticultural produce excluding apples, pears, hops and mushrooms, and to use the resultant funds to commission research and development. A draft order under the Industrial Organisation and Development Act 1947 will be laid before Parliament shortly with a view to the council coming into being in June or July this year.

My right hon. Friend is encouraged that the horticultural industry has responded in this positive way to the Government's policy that industry should contribute to R and D from which it benefits and very much hopes that other sectors of the agriculture industry will follow this lead.

Sugar Beet

26. Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied with the prospects for suger beet growers in the west midlands; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Yes. I see no reason at present to be dissatisfied.

Lamb Prices

27. Mr. Charles Morrison asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the spring 1986 lamb prices.

Mr. Gummer: Average market prices for lamb in March and April this year have been higher than in the corresponding weeks of previous years, partly reflecting lower supplies due to the poor weather which has delayed the growth of lambs.

Environmental Protection

28. Sir Hector Monro asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if there have been any recent developments in the area of environmental protection for which he is responsible; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: Environmental objectives are now fully integrated into the policy areas for which I am responsible. To underline my commitment, the Agriculture Bill currently before Parliament contains a clause which will place upon me and my successors a statutory duty to endeavour to achieve a reasonable balance between the inter-related needs of the countryside; agriculture, conservation, socio-economic interests and recreation.

EC (Structure Proposals)

29. Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are his initial reactions to the Community's 1986 structures proposals; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: I support the principle of encouraging alternative land use and diversification into alternative agricultural products in which the Community is not in surplus.

We shall, of course, wish to consider carefully the Commission's detailed proposals in this light, taking full account of their effectiveness and the likely costs and benefits.

New Zealand Butter

30. Sir Peter Mills asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether New Zealand butter quota is included in the EEC calculation of the United Kingdom's milk quota; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The United Kingdom milk quota, like those of other member states, is based on past national production levels with no account being taken of imports from New Zealand or any other source.

Dry Sow Stalls

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many representations have been received during the past two years by his Department on the subject of dry sow stalls.

Mrs. Fenner: Many of the letters my Department receives deal with several animal welfare issues at once. During the past two years about 400 of them have focused specifically on dry sow stalls.

Farm Incomes

Mr. Maclennan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied with the trend in farmers' real incomes over the last three years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The index of farming income in real terms rose from 113 to 146 in 1984. It fell sharply to 78 in 1985 particularly because of the bad weather. The constructive changes which were agreed in the price fixing are intended to protect farming incomes overall while at the same time tackling some of the problems of surpluses.

Pigs

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied with the present state of the pig industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: After the reasonable years of 1984 and 1985 the profitability of pig production has declined this year as pig prices have fallen and feed costs have increased. However, pig prices have stabilised since the introduction of a private storage aid scheme on 1 April. The reduction in cereal prices which will flow from the recent price fixing decisions will benefit the pig industry as will the reduction in negative MCAs in the pig sector. Long term prospects will depend on the continuing balance between supply and demand for pigs and on the industry's own efforts to expand its share of the United Kingdom market for bacon and other pigmeat products and develop pigmeat exports. This is one area in which we still do not meet the United Kingdom demand.

Spanish Corn and Sorghum

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the current percentage level of variable levy which is applicable to imports of corn and sorghum to Spain in consequence of the accession of Spain to the European Economic Community; and what was the level of levy applied before the treaty of Accession was signed.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Privatisation

Mr. Thurnham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the latest estimates for savings by his Department during 1986-87 as a result of contracting out services to private contractors.

Mr. Jopling: We estimate that contracting out foreign travel arrangements will save about £74,000 in 1986-87. Also my Department will be testing the market for a number of new activities in 1986-87. The possible savings will depend upon the results of those tenders.

Food From Britain

Mr. Pike asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has received about the future financing of Food From Britain.

Mr. Gummer: We have received a large number of representations, almost all emphasising the importance of Food From Britain. I very much hope that the industry will respond to this feeling and play its part by providing FFB with the funds necessary to secure its future.

Imports (Radiation)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied that EEC nations are able to identify which agricultural products imported from the East German state bodies were actually grown or processed in other East European states; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Fenner: Discussions are in progress in Brussels on these issues.

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has any information about the extent to which agricultural produce in East Germany has been affected by radiation from the Soviet nuclear power station at Chernobyl; and if there is any evidence that it has been affected less than produce grown in Romania and Hungary.

Mrs. Fenner: Information on the extent of radioactivity in agricultural produce is being collected and will be studied by the appropriate authorities in Brussels.

Mr. Robert Maclennan asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, whether the royalty income and receipts from sales from the National Seed Development Organisation is available directly to finance further breeding work.

Mrs. Fenner: Fifty per cent. of the royalty income from the NSDO, together with all dividend payments, accrues to the Consolidated Fund for extra receipts. The remainder of the royalty and sales income is used to finance NSDO's business of the production and marketing of state-bred varieties. NSDO income is therefore not available directly to finance breeding work.

EEC Stocks

Mr. Leadbitter asked the Mnister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the European Economic Community stocks held in dairy products and beef; what steps he has taken to include the United Kingdom in the marketing of those stocks; and what representations he has made to curtail the supply of stocks to Russia and Libya.

Mr. Gummer: The Community continues to have excessive stocks of milk products and of beef. In the short term we are seeking to reduce the stocks, including the use of schemes to benefit consumers in the Community. Exports on to the world market are often a more cost-effective outlet but we are opposed to arrangements which pick out particular countries for special treatment.

Herd Buy-out Schemes

Mr. Speller asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will seek powers to implement a whole herd buy-out scheme to purchase and slaughter cows, similar to that now in operation in the United States of America; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The American scheme is similar to the EC non-marketing of milk premium scheme which operated between 1977 and 1980 but which did not prove to be a great success. The Commission has preferred to tackle the problem through an EC outgoers scheme linked to milk quotas and which aims to reduce quota levels by 3 per cent. over the next three years.

Agricultural Advice

Dr. Marek asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects to be in a position to announce details of the new charges for agricultural advice.

Mrs. Fenner: We intend to give the industry an indication of the types of advice and services ADAS will market at the 1986 Royal Show. The prices to be charged for the different types of advisory products and services and the condition of business will be announced during the second half of 1986 and early in 1987.

EEC Price Review

Mr. Latham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will make a statement on the latest state of negotiations on the European Economic Community price review.

Mr. Jopling: I refer my hon. Friend to the statement my right hon. Friend made to the House on 28 April.

Advisory Committee on Pesticides

Sir Richard Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his practice as to establishing, before appointing a candidate to the Advisory Committee on Pesticides, whether he or she is or has been employed as a consultant to a company manufacturing pesticides or engaged by such a company to undertake research.

Mrs. Fenner: Our first concern when considering candidates for appointment to the Advisory Committee on Pesticides is to establish whether, with their particular expertise and experience, they would be able to make a worthwhile contribution to the committee's work.

Although past commercial connections of prospective candidates are taken into account, the existence of such connections would not necessarily prevent us from appointing an individual. It is of course a condition of appointment to the committee that prospective members sign a declaration of their present independence from all commercial interests.

Veal Calves

Sir Richard Body asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether any grant of public money has been authorised by his Department for the construction of a veal calf rearing unit fitted with crates or pens less than 2 ft wide since the issue of the welfare code on the keeping of veal calves.

Mrs. Fenner: The present welfare code for cattle recommends that the width of a pen for a singly-penned animal should be not less than the height of the animal at the withers. Units that do not comply with this or other recommendations of the code would not be eligible for grant. I am aware of one unit with pens less than 2 ft wide that was grant-aided in 1979 when the previous cattle code recommended a smaller space allowance.

Surpluses (Price Fixing)

Mr. Marlow asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, assuming similar weather patterns in 1986 to 1985, what estimate he has made of the effect, in volume and value terms, by commodity, of the latest common agricultural policy price fixing on surpluses.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 2 May 1986, c. 492]: The common agricultural policy price fixing includes adjustments to the cereals regime which by changing the intervention arrangements and quality standards will, together with the 3 per cent. co-responsibility levy, substantially reduce the effective level of support. For the milk sector a cut of 3 per cent. in quotas in all member states has been agreed. It is not possible to estimate the effect of these and the other changes on production in 1986 given the many uncertainties, including how producers will respond to the pressure on support prices.

Agricultural Holdings

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he will bring up to date the information on the size and ownership of agricultural holdings given in his answer of 22 July 1982, Official Report, column 251-54.

Mrs. Fenner [pursuant to her reply, 6 May 1986, c. 94]: The requested information is as follows, together with revised data for 1980.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Royal Victoria Hospital, Belfast

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total value of scientific and medical equipment which disappeared from the Royal Victoria hospital, Belfast, in each of the past five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: The total value of losses of clinical equipment is as follows:

1980-81	120
1981-82	363
1982-83	2,010
1983-84	1,301
1984-85	79

The safeguarding of equipment is a matter for local management.

Armagh Prison

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland why workmen are working overtime during weekends at the former Armagh prison; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the right hon. Gentleman as soon as possibe.

Soviet Union (Nuclear Accident)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he proposes to make a statement about (a) the implications of the Chernobyl nuclear disaster for the people of Northern Ireland, (b) precautions to be taken and (c) the existing monitoring systems in Ulster.

Mr. Tom King: Radiation levels, well below those which might give cause for concern, were detected in the eastern part of the Province on Saturday evening 3 May. The levels were only slightly above those found naturally in Northern Ireland as normal background radiation. The levels have been decreasing since that date and are well below recommended levels for precautionary action.

Press statements were issued by the Northern Ireland Office on Tuesday 6 May and Thursday 8 May giving details of radiation levels and telephone numbers for further public inquiries.

Monitoring of radiation levels in Northern Ireland is carried out regularly by a number of Government Departments. Milk and water supplies in the Province are being monitored and radiation measurements are being taken in the atmosphere. In addition, ships from the Baltic arriving in Northern Ireland are being checked for signs of radioactivity.

Maze Prison

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland why there has been a recent change in policy to combine the compound and cellular sections of Her Majesty's prison, the Maze; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: I shall reply to the right hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Leavers (Qualifications)

Mr. Forman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will set out in tabular form the number of graduates or qualified leavers from other institutions of higher education in Great Britain for every year from 1970 to the latest available date, together with such information as he has as to the comparable figures for France, West Germany, Italy, Japan and the United States of America;

(2) if he will set out in tabular form the number of qualified leavers, the age participation index and the qualified participation index for higher education in Great Britain for every year from 1970 to the latest available date, together with such information, as he has as to the comparable figures for France, West Germany, Italy, Japan and the United States of America.

Mr. Walden: Data in the form requested are not available for all years. The table shows such data as are readily available and can be provided without disproportionate cost.

School and College Sports Facilities

Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what guidance is currently given to local education authorities on policies towards making school and college sports facilities more widely available for community use, and on seeking dual-use of existing non-educational sports facilities for the schools and colleges under their control.

Mr. Dunn: Extensive guidance has been given by the Department both on the "dual use" of educational premises and facilities, and on the joint provision of facilities designed from the outset to serve educational as well as non-educational users. Policy guidance is set out in circular 11/64 "Provision of Facilities for Sport" and circular 2/70 "The Chance to Share". Design guidance is available in a number of publications, copies of which are available in the Library, and which include building bulletins 49 "Abraham Moss Centre, Manchester" (1973), 59 "The Victoria Centre, Crewe" (1981), 28 "Playing fields and hard surface areas" (1982), and design notes 14 "School and Community" (1976), 36 "Secondary school playing fields" (1983) and 42 "The Dukeries Complex —a place for the family" (1985).

Southern Examining Group (Syllabuses)

Dr. Glyn asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he remains satisfied that all syllabuses issued by the Southern Examining Group will be available in schools for the heads of department by the end of May.

Mr. Dunn: I understand that the Southern Examining Group expects to have distributed 47 syllabuses to schools by the end of the month. A further 29 syllabuses will be distributed shortly afterwards.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Crown Prosecution Service

Mr. John Morris asked the Attorney-General how many vacancies in the Crown Prosecutors Department have now been filled in London and in the areas in which there was hitherto no prosecuting solicitor's department.

The Attorney-General: The total authorised establishment (legal and non-legal grades) for each of the Crown prosecution service areas to which the right hon. and learned Member's question refers is shown in the table, together with the number of staff currently employed by the Director and assigned to that area.

Area	Authorised establishment	Staff in post in service of Director
Inner London	369	71
Outer London North	223	35
Outer London South (including Surrey)	181	32
Bedfordshire/Hertfordshire	89	18
Leicesterhire/Northamptonshire	78	14
Staffordshire/Warwickshire	79	14
Cleveland/North Yorkshire	82	17

The numbers of staff in post do not include the staff currently employed by the prosecuting solicitors' departments in Northamptonshire, Warwickshire and Cleveland who will transfer to the Crown prosecution service on 1 October 1986, nor do they include any staff who have been appointed but not yet taken up their posts.

Mr. Derry Mainwaring Knight

Mr. Greenway asked the Attorney-General if he will provide a breakdown of the costs of the recent trial of Mr. Derry Mainwaring Knight; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The total cost to public funds of an individual trial comprises numerous elements, some of which may be part of the general running costs of the several Government Departments concerned and therefore cannot be ascertained as separate component except as a somewhat arbitrary estimate. So far as regards fees to the legal profession (prosecuting or defending), it is not the practice to publish individual fees, and in any event these cannot be ascertained until after taxation of bills of costs, which has not yet taken place.

WALES

Cancer

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many women in Wales died of (a) breast cancer and (b) cervical cancer in each of the years 1980 to 1985, inclusive.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The information is given in the following table:

ICD Numbers	Cause of death	Number of deaths
		1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985
	Malignant neoplasm of:

180	Cervix uteri	125	133	118	136	114	139

Radiation

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what measures he has taken to inform and provide about a contaminated atmosphere and rainfall consequential upon the nuclear power station disaster in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics;

(2) if he will set up a telephone information office in Cardiff to handle requests for information and to provide advice to inquirers about the consequences of the Chernobyl reactor disaster; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Information and advice was provided on 5 May by the National Radiological Protection Board, in conjunction with the Welsh Office and other Government Departments. A statement was made to the House on 6 May by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment about the arrangements for monitoring the effects in the United Kingdom of the accident at Chernobyl and a special telephone inquiry point was established that day within the Welsh Office. On 7 May, the Welsh Office issued a press notice updating advice given previously, and further advice will be issued as necessary.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General if he will publish a table showing the most recent rates of unemployment in (a) all travel-to-work areas receiving regional development grants, (b) all travel-to-work areas receiving only regional selective assistance, (c) travel-to-work areas which receive no assistance but have rates higher than any in (a) and (b) and (d) travel-to-work areas which receive no assistance but have rates within 2 per cent. of any in (a) and (b).

Mr. Lang: Following are tables giving the requested information for travel-to-work areas as at 6 March 1986. Table A shows the 42 travel-to-work areas that receive regional development grants; table B the 57 travel-to-work areas that receive only regional selective assistance; table C the 68 travel-to-work areas that receive no assistance but have rates higher than any in tables A or B; and table D shows the 118 travel-to-work areas that receive no assistance but have rates within 2 per cent. of any in tables A and B.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Paymaster General if he will publish a table of employees in employment at June 1979, June 1983 and December 1985 which shows (a) all employees, (b) part-time employees and (c) employees who are engaged in Government special employment schemes.

Mr. Lang: The available estimates are:

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Investment Companies

Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to what extent his Department is able to exercise its regulatory role in respect of the activities in the United Kingdom of companies based in foreign countries which offer investments to citizens in the United Kingdom but which transact their business entirely by post and which do not have any establishment or outlet in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: My Department can exercise its regulatory powers only upon persons within United Kingdom jurisdiction. However, I presume that my hon. Friend's concern was prompted mainly by the activities of certain firms in Amsterdam; and i am glad to be able to tell him that the Netherlands authorities — who have been well aware of our concern about these activities— have now taken appropriate measures. The relevant legislation came into effect on 1 May.

Since a number of hon. Members have written to me on this subject, I am having a copy of the English language briefing, prepared by the Netherlands Ministry of Finance, placed in the Library.

Gas Consumer Council

Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what salary he expects to pay to regional representatives on the Gas Consumer Council if the Gas Bill is enacted;

(2) what salary is currently paid to chairmen of regional gas consumer councils.

Mr. Howard: The chairmen of regional gas consumer councils currently receive a salary of £7,272 in respect of a commitment of two days per week. Regional representatives on the new Gas Consumer Council will receive £3,500 for a commitment of one day per week. The duties of regional representatives will be less onerous than those of chairmen of the current gas councils, since they will not involve chairing regional council meetings nor supervision of staff in regional offices, who will be managed by the director of the new Gas Consumer Council assisted by a field director.

Food Imports (East Europe)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will take steps to ensure that any Community prohibition on the import of food and produce from eastern European states applies equally to East Germany; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: I have been asked to reply.

As my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State told my hon. Friend on 8 May, at column 255, the proposed ban, if agreed, is limited to countries substantially within 1,000 km radius of Chernobyl. The application of the ban will be reviewed by the Community to take account of the latest scientific evidence.

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish the relative export price of United Kingdom manufactures each year compared with German export prices for manufactures based on 1976=100 together with the change in the nominal exchange rate since the last year for which relative export prices are available.

Mr. Alan Clark [pursuant to his reply, 2 May 1986, c. 523]: In March 1986 the nominal sterling/deutschmark exchange rate was 14 per cent. higher than the average rate for 1984. The relative export prices are in the following table.

Exports of manufactures—Relative export prices 1976=100*

HOME DEPARTMENT

Airports

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is Her Majesty's Government's normal commitment of funds and personnel in establishing immigration controls at an airport newly designated a port of entry; and how many airports have received this status in each of the past 15 years.

Mr. Waddington: The staffing of any port by the immigration service is related to the level of passenger traffic scheduled to arrive at that port. Airports are not normally designated as ports of entry until it has been demonstrated over a period that they meet the criteria for designation. These are that scheduled services carrying substantial numbers of passengers subject to immigration control arrive at the port. Airports were first designated as ports of entry under the Immigration (Ports of Entry) Order 1972 which came into effect on 1 January 1973. The airports designated under that order were:

Ashford,
Belfast,
Birmingham
Bournemouth (Hurn)
Bristol
East Midlands
Edinburgh (Turnhouse)
London–Gatwick
Glamorgan
Glasgow
London–Heathrow
Liverpool
Luton
Lydd
Manchester
Manston
Newcastle
Prestwick
Southampton
Southend
London–Stansted
Tees-side

The Immigration (Ports of Entry) Amendment Order 1975 deleted Ashford and Manston from the list and added Aberdeen and Norwich.

The Immigration (Ports of Entry) Amendment Order 1979 registered a change of name from Glamorgan to Cardiff (Wales).

Immigration Service

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what preparations he is currently making for an extension of detention facilities for use by the immigration service at Harmondsworth; whether he intends to make any improvements in the conditions of such facilities within the Heathrow terminals; and what contingency plans he has made for the effect on the detention facilities available for the immigration service of industrial action by officers in the prison service.

Mr. Waddington: We are reviewing arrangements for persons detained under the Immigration Act 1971 including the possible provision of additional detention accommodation at Harmondsworth and the improvement of the facilities at Heathrow in the light of the Government's response to the sixth report from the Home Affairs Committee (Session 1984-85). A variety of contingency plans have been made in case access to prisons was restricted or prison places became unavailable as the result of industrial action by officers of the prison service. These could be applied to detainees under the Immigration Act as to other prisoners.

West Midlands Police

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the West Midlands as to what further plans there are for replacing uniformed officers with civilians on paperwork in the West Midlands police force; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The West Midlands police authority is continuing to implement a phased programme of civilianisation in the force. The civilian strength on 31 March 1986 was 1,661. I understand that its plans for the current financial year are intended to release up to 100 police officers from administrative and other work which does not require the powers and training of a police officer. Further plans are being formulated for implementation in 1987-88.

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the West Midlands as to how many hours of police overtime the West Midlands force spent on paperwork in each of the years since 1980; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the chief constable that this information is not available.

Electoral Rolls

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what precautions are taken, and checks made, to prevent persons who are not Commonwealth citizens or citizens of the Irish Republic from being registered as voters.

Mr. Mellor: The electoral registration form states that only the names of Commonwealth citizens and citizens of the Irish Republic may be entered and electoral registration officers have powers to insist on the production of documentary evidence on nationality. The new form to be introduced this year will also make it clear that giving false information is an offence. Lists of the people whom it is proposed to include on the electoral register have to be publicly displayed, and any elector who thinks that somebody who is not eligible has been included can object to the registration officer during the period set aside for such objections—28 November to 16 December.

Joint Boards

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish details of the manpower schemes for the first three financial years of the joint boards set up following abolition of the Greater London council and for which his Department is responsible.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The following manpower levels were included in the establishment scheme for the London fire and civil defence authority for the financial year 1986-87 and laid before Parliament on 27 March under the provisions os section 85 of the Local Government Act 1985:

	Number
Fire Service Staff
Whole-time uniform staff	6,849
Civilian staff	1,181
Control room staff	196
Emergency Planning Staff	41
Central Services Staff	131

The authority is required to submit its proposed schemes for the 1987-88 and 1988-89 financial years by 1 January 1987 and 1 January 1988 respectively, and they will be considered at that time.

News International Plant, Wapping

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many ambulances were called by the Metropolitan police to Wapping on 3 May.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand that as a result of police telephone calls nine ambulances attended during the evening.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers from Newham were on duty in Wapping on the night of 3 May.

Mr. Giles Shaw: Seventy-nine.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will hold an inquiry into the events outside the News International plant in Wapping on 3 May.

Mr. Giles Shaw: No. Any complaints against the police will be dealt with according to the procedures approved by Parliament. I understand that 65 people have been charged with offences in connection with the disorders. The courts will deal with those cases in the usual way.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers were injured outside the News International plant in Wapping on 3 May; and how many needed hospital treatment.

Mr. Giles Shaw: One hundred and seventy five officers were injured, 43 of whom required hospital treatment.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has of the number of members of the public injured outside the News International plant in Wapping on 3 May; and how many required hospital treatment.

Mr. Giles Shaw: The Commissioner understands that 29 members of the public received hospital treatment. Information about other injuries is not available.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers were on duty in connection with the dispute in Wapping on Saturday 3 May; and what was the cost.

Mr. Leighton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police were on duty at Wapping on Saturday 3 May; what was the cost; what has been the total cost of policing this dispute so far; what are the names and ranks of the police officers injured at Wapping on 3 May; what were their injuries; what were the names of the hospitals they were treated in; and what is the date of their return to duty.

Mr. Giles Shaw: I understand from the Commissioner that 1,744 police officers were deployed on the evening of 3 May. One hundred and seventy five officers between and including the ranks of constable and superintendent were injured, the injuries ranging from concussion, cuts and bruises to burns to the head. Those officers whose injuries required hospital treatment were all taken to the London hospital. Information about their return to duty and the cost of police operations on that night and since the dispute began is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what has been the average number of police per day stationed outside the News International works, Wapping, since the industrial dispute began;

(2) what is the total amount of police time spent at the News International works, Wapping, since the industrial dispute started.

Mr. Giles Shaw [pursuant to his reply, 28 April 1986, c. 302]: The number of police officers held available for deployment at the News International plant varies from day to day and hour to hour, from a minimum of about 25 to a maximum of about 1,800, depending on the current or likely public order situation. Up to and including 25 April it is estimated that approximately 350,000 police man hours have been spent at or near the plant in connection with the dispute.

PRIME MINISTER

Conservation

Mr. Nicholls asked the Prime Minister what measures her Government have taken to promote or protect the environment; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The Government have taken many important measures to protect and enhance the environment. The principal ones are as follows.

The Wildlife and Countryside Act of 1981 has proved to be the most important piece of legislation in its field for many years. It has strengthened measures for the protection of native flora and fauna, and provided powers for the conservation of the countryside including natural habitats which are essential for the survival of wildlife.

Since 1979 we have increased funding for the Countryside Commission and the Nature Conservancy Council in real terms by 49 and 142 per cent. respectively.

A number of initiatives have recently been taken to integrate environmental objectives into agricultural policies. These include changes to the farm capital grants system to provide clear incentives for environmentally beneficial projects, and statutory powers under the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985 to control pesticide use and supply.

We have taken an active part in the European Community, including the initiative in measures to eliminate lead from petrol, the agreement on vehicle emissions, the prohibition of trade in endangered species, and the protection of whales and seals from slaughter. We will play our part in the European Year of the Environment 1987.

We have negotiated a European directive requiring environmental assessment of certain major types of project and have recently published a consultation document outlining proposals for implementing it within the context of the town and country planning system.

In 1982 we launched the Mersey basin campaign, a major long-term project involving combined effort by the public, private and voluntary sectors. Its aim is to remedy severe pollution in the water courses of the Mersey basin and to promote matching improvements in the appearance, use and jobs prospects of the water front.

We have supported the development of the groundwork initiative which is dedicated to the regeneration of run-down land at the urban fringe through community effort. Starting in the north-west, groundwork trusts have been established in nine areas; more are in the pipeline.

Regulations have been introduced to control the use of organotin compounds in anti-fouling paints for boats, so as to protect sensitive marine organisms in coastal waters.

We have implemented part II of the Control of Pollution Act 1974, extending the effluent discharge consent procedure to coastal and estuarial waters.

A hazardous wastes inspectorate has been established within the Department of the Environment.

By the end of 1985 the permitted level of lead in petrol was reduced by over 60 per cent., and important steps have been taken to reduce exposure to lead from other sources including food, water paint and industrial emissions.

We have secured a progressive reduction in radioactive discharges from the BNFL reprocessing plant at Sellafield to less than one sixth of their 1979 levels. On 30 April we announced our intention to impose still tighter controls on discharges and, for the first time, to set specific limits on a wide range of individual radioactive substances.

The Housing and Planning Bill now before Parliament contains a number of proposals designed to improve the protection of the environment. In the circular accompanying the White Paper "Lifting the Burden," published on 16 July 1985, we accepted that quality of the environment was a planning consideration.

The policy of the Government is to achieve the highest environmental standards that are cost-effective and do not place unnecessary burdens on industry. We shall continue to play a full role in Europe and on the wider international stage. We place a high priority on preserving and improving the quality of the environment.

Nuclear Fallout (Emergency Plans)

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Prime Minister what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards creating and uprating emergency plans and procedures for implementation in the event of threat from nuclear fallout.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to his question of 8 May at column 216. Plans and procedures are kept under review, and will be examined in the light of the Chernobyl accident.

Radioactive Contamination

Miss Fookes asked the Prime Minister if she is satisfied with the co-ordination of the activities of the Department of Health and Social Security, the Foreign Office and the Department of the Environment in advising United Kingdom citizens returning from Russia and neighbouring countries at the present time and in the future on radioactive contamination from the Chernobyl disaster.

The Prime Minister: Yes. However, these arrangements are continuously reviewed and can be changed if necessary.

Miss Fookes asked the Prime Minister if she will take steps to set up a scientific committee charged with the responsibility of collecting data on all British citizens in contact with radioactivity from the Chernobyl disaster including the institution of long-term monitoring of the individuals concerned.

The Prime Minister: I am aware of the suggestion that has been made, but we are content with the arrangements made to monitor British citizens affected. In the light of the contamination levels detected, there is no good medical reason to monitor these people further. Should there be any change in circumstances affecting returning British citizens, the arrangements will be adjusted as necessary.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Milk (Radioactivity)

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will compare the normal levels of radioactivity in milk with those measured on Wednesday 30 April, Thursday 1 May, Friday 2 May, Saturday 3 May, Sunday 4 May, Monday 5 May and Tuesday 6 May, respectively; if he will also compare these with the derived emergency reference level for radionuclides in milk; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what was (i) the maximum level of radioactivity in the United Kingdom measured in milk in the period 30 April to the latest available date and the date and site of this measurement, (ii) the derived emergency reference level for radioactivity in milk used in the United Kingdom and (iii) the emergency reference level of radioactivity in milk recommended by the International Atomic Energy Agency; and if he will make a statement advising on contingency action in the event of radioactivity above safe levels in milk supplies.

Mr. Jopling: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Frozen Food

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 6 May to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby, whether he has any proposals to compensate British frozen food manufacturers for the loss of markets in Spain resulting from the increased tariff on frozen vegetables in the Treaty of Accession of Spain.

Mrs. Fenner: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Civil Servants (Briefcases)

Mr. Hayward asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the cost of providing civil servants with briefcases in each of the last five years.

Mr. Brooke: HMSO estimates the cost at approximately:

1981-82	69,000
1982-83	98,000
1983-84	111,000
1984-85	118,000
1985-86	141,000

Mr. Hayward asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current cost of each briefcase provided to civil servants.

Mr. Brooke: The standard PVC briefcase at present costs £7.36. The standard leathercloth case costs £25.19.

Mr. Hayward asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has reviewed the policy of providing briefcases to civil servants.

Mr. Brooke: I see no reason to do so. Departments are individually responsible for controlling their own expenditure on briefcases and stationery items.

NHS (Capital Expenditure)

Mr. Thurnham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received recently about the level of capital expenditure in the National Health Service during the next two years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: Various representations have been received about the level of capital expenditure in the NHS. The Government have increased provision for NHS capital expenditure by over 20 per cent. in real terms since 1979. Our public expenditure plans set out in Cmnd. 9702 allow for this level to be maintained over the next few years. Forty-three major new hospital schemes, each costing over £5 million, are planned to start over the next three years.

Civil List

Mr. Canavan asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the total amount of Civil List expenditure; and who are the beneficiaries.

Mr. Lawson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 18 March 1986, at columns 97-98, to my hon. Friend the Member for Stevenage (Mr. Wood).

Personal Taxation

Mr. Corrie asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of the population does not pay income tax in 1986-87 who did pay tax in 1978-79.

Mr. Moore [pursuant to his reply, 21 April 1986, c. 38]: About 1·4 million fewer individuals will pay income tax in 1986-87 than under an indexed 1978-79 regime. This represents about 3 per cent. of the adult population.

Everyman Theatre

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Minister for the Arts if he will make a statement on the implications of the abolition of Merseyside council for the funding of the Everyman Theatre in Liverpool.

Mr. Luce: The Arts Council has already offered half the sum required to replace the Merseyside county council's funding of the Everyman theatre in 1985-86. It is negotiating with the successor authorities, which are being asked to match the Arts Council contribution, and thus secure the theatre's future.

NCB (Employees)

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many people were employed by the National Coal Board at the latest available date.

Mr. David Hunt: I am advised that as at 29 March 1986 some 173,838 persons were employed by the National Coal Board.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many tonnes of spent oxide fuel from Italy have been imported into the United Kingdom.

Mr. Goodlad: At 31 December 1985, approximately 85 te U of oxide spent fuel had been imported from Italy.

Electricity Generation Costs

Mr. Corrie asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give details of the current comparative cost of producing electricity from coal, oil, gas, hydroelectric and nuclear power; and if he will give similar figures for 1 January.

Mr. Goodlad: I shall arrange for the CEGB to write to my hon. Friend.

Nuclear Installations

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Energy what contingency arrangements there are for alerting, informing and if necessary evacuating residents in the country in the event of a major radiation leak at a United Kingdom nuclear installation.

Mr. Goodlad: The arrangements are set out in the Health and Safety Executive's booklet "Emergency plans for civil nuclear installations" published by HM Stationery Office in 1982, a copy of which is available in the Library.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Radiation

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made as to which European countries are safe for British citizens to visit without risk of radiation sickness arising from the Chernobyl disaster; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Our current advice is that British citizens should avoid visiting Kiev and west Ukraine and Minsk and Byelorussia and Lithuania and north-east Poland unless absolutely necessary. There are no reasons to advise against visiting other areas in western or eastern Europe. Additionally we advise precautions on food and drink in Warsaw, north-east Poland, Lithuania, west Ukraine, Byelorussia and Romania.

We continue to consider our advice on a very regular basis.

Mr. Rory McKenna

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the official title, departmental role and authority to speak on behalf of the European Economic Community of Mr. Rory McKenna, in relation to policy on regional aid from Europe.

Mrs. Chalker: Mr. McKenna is an official of the regional policy directorate of the EC Commission. He is not a Commission spokesman.

Soviet Union (Nuclear Accident)

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance the United Kingdom is giving to the Soviet Union with regard to the Chernobyl disaster; and what help has been offered but not yet accepted.

Mr. Eggar: The United Kingdom is providing up to 80 heat-resistant suits and up to 110 breathing sets together with a compressor and decontamination unit. These are expected to reach Moscow on 9 May. All other possible assistance has also been offered, but the Soviet authorities have not indicated that they require any assistance.

Uganda

Mr. Norris asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has for the provision of military assistance to Uganda.

Mrs. Chalker: At the request of the new Government of Uganda, the British military advisory and training team in Uganda is to be expanded to a strength of about 30 in order to start a programme of training military instructors of Ugands's national resistance army. The training programme will begin in June.

DEFENCE

North-West England (Jobs)

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a further statement about the possible relocation of defence jobs to north-west England.

Mr. Lee: I have nothing to add to the reply that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) on 11 March 1986 at column 802.

Comprehensive Test Ban

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence what military impediments there are to the achievement of a comprehensive test ban.

Mr. Stanley: There would be serious risks to our security interests were we to agree to a comprehensive test ban that was not adequately verifiable. For example, other countries might try to continue a military nuclear weapon testing programme covertly whilst we would not.

Cruise Missiles

Mr. Deakins asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation has any system which would enable other countries to distinguish cruise missiles carrying nuclear warheads from those carrying conventional warheads.

Mr. Stanley: No.

Rainfall Statistics

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will publish the rainfall in millimetres for the months of October, November, December, January, February and March for each year since 1976 for each of the following meteorological stations in the county of Cumbria: Keswick Stable Hills, Buttermere water works, Millbeck, How Farm, Hause Gill water works, Fleetwith Pike, Bleaberry Tarn, Stonethwaite, Thirlmere, Honister, Seathwaite, Styhead and Birkside.

Mr. Lee: The information requested is voluminous but I have written to the hon. Member.

USS Nathaniel Green

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he was informed by the United States authorities of the incident in March when USS Nathaniel Green ran aground in the Irish Sea; whether there was any damage to the nuclear propulsion unit; if the Poseidon missiles aboard were armed; what action he took as a result; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stanley: The United States authorities informed my Department on 13 March that the USS Nathaniel Green had been damaged. Approval was given for the boat to berth at the Holy Loch facilities for repairs. I understand that the nuclear propulsion system was not damaged. It has been the policy of successive Governments neither to confirm nor deny the presence of nuclear weapons.

Nuclear Submarines (Waste Disposal)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has received representations from or held consultations with the fishing industry about the siting of dumps to contain the waste from nuclear submarines.

Mr. John Lee: No. However, any views which the fishing industry has to offer would naturally be given careful consideration.

Chemical Weapons

Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the levels of nerve gas and chemical weapons held by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation.

Mr. Stanley: The Soviet Union has a major chemical warfare capability. Its chemical weapons stockpile is assessed to include some 300,000 tonnes of nerve agent alone. It has specialist troops responsible for aspects of nuclear, biological and chemical warfare. Soviet forces are also comprehensively equipped and trained to operate in a chemically contaminated environment. There are no chemical weapons declared to NATO, although the United States possesses a limited and aging retaliatory capability.

Advertising Agencies

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Defence which advertising agencies have been engaged by his Department for each of the past five years; and what sums each have been paid.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his reply, 6 May 1986, c. 101] The advertising agencies engaged by the Ministry of Defence during the last five years and the sums paid in each year are as follows:

TRANSPORT

Drink-Driving

Mr. Best asked the Secretary of State for Transport, further to his answer to the hon. Member for Yyns Môn of 28 April, Official Report, column 310, what extra resources have been notified to him that the police will be allocating during the drink-driving enforcement campaign in May and June.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The current focus on drinking and driving was planned in close consultation with the police. We have not assumed that individual chief officers will be increasing the level of enforcement during the publicity period. The focus is designed to increase awareness that drinking and driving is dangerous and a problem throughout the year. The police, through the traffic committee of the Association of Chief Police Officers, have welcomed this approach as an aid to their own year-round enforcement effort against drinking and driving.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the responsibilities of each of the deputy secretaries in his Department and the number and ranks of staff reporting to each.

Mr. Ridley: The responsibilities of the deputy secretaries in my Department are as follows:

Deputy Secretary, Highways and Traffic

Highways and traffic policy, the highways programme and maintenance, contracts, and highways and traffic questions in Greater London. The Chief Highway Engineer's Department. Management of the highways and traffic work of the Department in the regions.

Deputy Secretary, Civil Aviation and Principal Finance Officer

Civil aviation, including international aviation negotiations; and other international transport matters. Public expenditure on transport and financial management and control.

Deputy Secretary, Economics, Statistics and Research and Chief Economic Adviser

Economic advice to the Department; responsibility for the Department's economics Divisions, statistical services and for the planning, formulation and management of the Department's research and scientific programme.

Deputy Secretary, Surface Transport Industries

Matters relating to the rail, road haulage and bus industries and the related nationalised industry boards.

Deputy Secretary, Shipping, Marine, Road and Vehicle Safety and Licensing Matters relating to shipping policy, marine safety and pollution prevention, ports, driver and vehicle licensing, road and vehicle safety, vehicle and component approval, vehicle testing, driver testing and training, motor vehicle insurance and vehicle excise duty.

Chief Scientific Adviser

Evaluations of scientific issues relevant to the policies of the Department.

Director General of Organisation and Establishments

The Director General of Organisations and Establishments is the Departments' Principal Establishments Officer whose staff provide a common service to both the Department of Transport and the Department of the Environment (Central).

At 1 April 1986 the numbers and ranks of staff in the deputy secretary commands (other than common servants with the Department of the Environment) were as shown in the following table. A further 178 Department of Transport staff were not attached to the five commands indicated.

Vehicle Registration Prefix

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is giving consideration to abandoning the present annual changing of vehicle registration prefixes.

Mr. Michael Spicer: We have no plans to do so. The retention of the vehicle age identification system is strongly supported by the Police because it is often an important element in tracing a vehicle where a witness cannot recall the complete number, and in the enforcement of vehicle testing requirements. The age identifier is also supported by consumer protection organisations and by large sections of the motor trade who consider that it helps to sell more new vehicles.

Coaches (Speed Governors)

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he now expects that the mandatory fitting of coach speed governors will come into force; if their use will be extended to heavy goods vehicles; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Discussions with vehicle and equipment manufacturers and vehicle user groups are underway at the British Standards Institution. I expect a British Standard to be agreed by the end of the year. I will be consulting the coach industry on a timetable to phase in the fitting of the equipment as rapidly as possible and I expect the first vehicles to be fitted during 1987.

Some heavy goods vehicles are voluntarily fitted with speed limiters. We have no plans at present to introduce any legal requirements.

Car Rallying (Safety)

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will discuss with the Royal Automobile Club the safety and conduct of off road car rallying; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Stringent rules governing safety and conduct are imposed by the Royal Automobile Club Motor Sports Association Ltd. when authorising rallies under the provisions of the Road Traffic Act 1972. The safety record for such events in the United Kingdom is good. There are no plans at present to open discussions.

Motorways (Signs)

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will consider the inclusion on motorway road signs alongside the miles to destination the kilometre equivalent.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No decision has been taken about a change to the metric measurement of distances in this country although in accordance with EEC directive 80 181 this is to be reviewed by 31 December 1989. Parliament will be consulted before any decision is taken. Meanwhile my right hon. Friend has no plans to introduce dual signing of distances.

Manpower Schemes, London

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish details of the manpower schemes for the first three financial years of the joint boards set up following abolition of the Greater London Council and for which his Department is responsible.

Mr. Ridley: There are no such boards.

LRT (Bus Routes)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many bus routes have been entirely withdrawn by London Regional Transport since June 1984.

Mr. David Mitchell: This is a matter for LRT.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many people are employed on bus services operated under tender to London Regional Transport, excluding those contracted to London Buses Ltd.

Mr. David Mitchell: This is a matter for London Regional Transport and those companies which supply tendered services.

London Transport Services (Staff)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many people were employed by London Underground in 1984, 1985 and 1986, respectively; and what financial savings have been made from the reduction in staffing levels;

(2) how many people were employed by London Buses in 1984, 1985 and 1986, respectively; and what financial savings have been made from the reduction in staffing levels;

(3) how many people were employed by London Regional Transport and its subsidiaries in 1984, 1985 and 1986, respectively; and what financial savings have been made from the reduction in staffing levels.

Mr. David Mitchell: Employment statistics for LRT, London Buses and London Underground may be found in LRT's annual business plans. More efficient use of manpower contributes to the more cost effective services which the plans also report.

Mr. Kenneth Joyner (Salary)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the salary of London Regional Transport board member Mr. Kenneth Joyner on 7 March 1985 and on 31 March 1985, respectively.

Mr. David Mitchell: £4,500 per annum on both dates.

LRT (Board Salaries)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the salaries of the board members of London Regional Transport; and if he has any plans to increase them.

Mr. David Mitchell: Current annual salaries of the board members of the LRT are as follows:

Member	Salary £	Time commitment
Chairman
Dr. Keith Bright	55,000	Full time
Deputy Chairman
Mr. David Hardy	14,000	1½ days per week
Full time members
Dr. Tony Ridley	44,000	Full time
Mr. John Telford Beasley
Mr. Barry Dale
Part time members
Sir Neil Shields	17,000	2 days per week
Mr. Keith Brown	5,000	½ day per week
Miss Eileen Cole
Dr. Stephen Glaister
Mr. Kenneth Joyner
Mrs. Helen Robinson
Miss Patricia Steel

These salaries are subject to annual review.

LRT (Revenue Subsidy)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has had with London Regional Transport on further reductions in its revenue subsidy; if he plans to issue directives requiring it to operate with zero revenue subsidy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: London Regional Transport's performance in bringing public transport services under efficient management means that the industry will need less revenue subsidy than was assumed in 1984 when Government objectives were set. I welcome the indications from LRT that if current performance is maintained there are prospects of relieving ratepayers and taxpayers of the burden of revenue subsidy.

Public Transport Employees (Assaults)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport when the study of assaults on bus staff in London was first announced; what submissions have been received; and when a report will be published.

Mr. David Mitchell: The study of assaults on bus staff is a national study and is not confined to London. Nominations for working group members were first invited in June 1984. All sides of the bus industry have been involved in regular meetings throughout 1984 and 1985. I have received no other submissions. A report and summary of the findings are due to be published on 19 May.

BR (Station Staff)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many people were employed as station staff by British Rail in Greater London in 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984, 1985 and 1986 respectively.

Mr. David Mitchell: This is a management matter for the British Railways Board. We do not have the information requested.

London Buses (Deregulation)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has had with London Regional Transport and its subsidiary London Buses on the deregulation of bus services in London.

Mr. David Mitchell: We have made clear that it is our firm intention to extend deregulation. The timetable for this is under review.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he proposes to deregulate bus services in London.

Mr. David Mitchell: Yes.

Bus Mileage, London

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the level of bus mileage secured by London Transport and London Regional Transport in 1983, 1984, 1985 and 1986, respectively.

Mr. David Mitchell: The annual bus mileage operated by London Regional Transport—formerly the London Transport Executive—between 1983 and 1985 was as follows:

	Million Miles
1983	164
1984	167
1985	164

The 1985 figure is provisional, and excludes services operated for LRT by operators other than London Buses Ltd. (less than 1 million bus miles). LRT plans to maintain mileage broadly at its present level during the current year.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the recorded level of passenger mileage on bus services secured by London Transport and London Regional Transport in January 1983, June 1983, January 1984, June 1984, January 1985, June 1985, and January 1986, respectively.

Mr. David Mitchell: My Department does not collect information at this level of detail. I suggest that the hon. Member asks LRT.

GLC Lorry Ban

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many representations he has received for and against the Greater London Council lorry ban from (a) individuals, (b) local authorities and (c) other organisations.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The GLC lorry ban is now a matter for the London boroughs. I do not know what representations they may have received. At May 1985, the latest date for which figures are available, we had received 2,575 representations against and four in favour of the ban. 507 were from individuals, seven from local authorities and 2,071 from other organisations.

Roads (London)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport when the four London road assessment studies are to be published.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Traffic surveys are now going ahead to complete the collection of data on transport-related problems in these corridors. This data will be shared with the boroughs concerned. We hope to publish reports on this phase of the work in the autumn.

Traffic Staffs, London

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many people were employed by the Greater London council in December 1985 and are currently employed by the London Residuary Body working on (a) bus priority measures, (b) pedestrian measures, (c) cycling measures and (d) traffic signals.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Under the terms of the contract with the London Residuary Body in respect of functions that fall to us, it is agreed that the LRB traffic control systems unit should have 89 posts to handle the matters quoted. GLC staffing was the responsibility of the GLC.

Departmental Staff

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many people were employed by the Greater London road and traffic division of his Department in December 1983, December 1984, December 1985 and April 1986, respectively.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The figures are as follows:

	Number
1 December 1983	94·5
1 December 1984	101·5
1 December 1985	135·5
1 April 1986	147·5

BREL, Springburn

Mr. Martin asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to visit the British Rail Engineering Ltd. workshops at Springburn.

Mr. David Mitchell: I visited the BREL, Springburn, works in 1984; I have currently no plans for a further visit.

London Transport Passenger Group

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was discussed at the meeting of the London Transport Passenger Group on 22 April; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: The meeting discussed progress towards the longer term objectives set out in my right hon. Friend's letter of 24 July 1984 to the chairmen of BR and LRT.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many times the London Transport Passenger Group has met; who has attended the meetings; what subjects have been discussed; and what measures have been adopted to co-ordinate London Regional Transport and British Rail services.

Mr. David Mitchell: Since its inception in July 1984, there have been six meetings of the London Passenger Transport Group which comprises my right hon. Friend, myself, and the chairmen of BR and LRT, with appropriate officials in attendance. The group discusses the issues set out in my right hon. Friends's letter of 24 July 1984 to the two chairmen. Achievements so far include the introduction of several joint marketing initiatives, including Capitalcard; the development of a programme of interchange improvements; and improved co-operation in provision for disabled people, including publication of the leaflet "A Helping Hand Across London".

Single-manned Buses (London)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what meetings have taken place between the London Regional Passengers Committee and London Buses and London Regional Transport to discuss the issue of one-person operated buses.

Mr. David Mitchell: The LRPC, London Buses and LRT are entirely free to meet each other whenever they wish. I would not expect to be informed of such meetings.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many representations have been received by the London Regional Passengers Committee for and against the conversion of bus routes in London to one-person operated buses.

Mr. David Mitchell: This is entirely a matter for the LRPC.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many representations he has received for and against the use of one-person operation in London by bus services secured by London Regional Transport.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend receives representations from time to time. The use of one-person operated buses in London is, however, an operational matter for London Regional Transport and its subsidiary London Buses Limited.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has received any communication from the London Regional Passengers Committee on the conversion of bus routes in London to one-person operated buses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have received a letter from the chairman of the London Regional Passengers Committee on this topic.

London Underground

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the stations on the London Underground currently equipped with close circuit television systems for the detection of crime.

Mr. David Mitchell: There are forty-one stations equipped with closed circuit television for surveillance purposes.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the stations on the London Underground which are shortly to be equipped with close-circuit television systems for the detection of crime.

Mr. David Mitchell: Recently authorisation for a further 37 stations to be equipped with CCTV was given. The detection of crime will form part of the equipment's role.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many crimes were detected on the London Underground by closed circuit television in 1983, 1984 and 1985.

Mr. David Mitchell: No separate record is kept of crimes detected by CCTV. It is used on a day-to-day basis by the British Transport police for monitoring parts of the Underground particularly prone to pick-pocketing and crimes of violence. A dual benefit is gained from the improved deployment of resources and more discreet surveillance. In this role the use of this facility has been important in the chain of events leading to the arrest and prosecution of offenders. There is also reason to believe that the use of CCTV has a marked deterrent effect on potential offenders on stations where it is in use.

Underground Trains (Single-manning)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport what advice he has had from the Railway Inspectorate on the one-person operation of deep level underground trains and what advice has been given by the Railway Inspectorate to London Regional Transport and London Underground on the matter.

Mr. David Mitchell: Following the successful introduction of one-person operation of trains on the Victoria and sub-surface lines, London Underground Ltd. is proposing to extend this method of working to other deep-level tube lines. Although London Underground Ltd. is responsible for the safe operation of its railways—and any decision on the manning of trains must be its—it consulted the railways inspectorate when establishing the arrangements for one-person operation of the Victoria and sub-surface lines, and is currently discussing with the inspectorate its proposals for the deep-level tubes. The inspectorate advises my right hon. Friend as necessary on developments affecting safety on the railways.

Rail Mileage (London)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what was the annual level of passenger train mileage run on British Rail's London inner suburban services in 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984, 1985 and 1986;

(2) what, using February 1980 as a base level of 100, was the average level of fares charged on British Rail's London inner surburban services in 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984, 1985 and 1986;

(3) what, measured against the retail price index, was the average level of fares charged on British Rail's London inner suburban services in 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984, 1985 and 1986.

Mr. David Mitchell: The information sent to me by British Rail does not distinguish between inner and outer suburban services.

LRT (Fares)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what, measured against the retail price index, was the average level of fares charged on London Regional Transport services in December 1984, February 1985 and February 1986;

(2) what, using February 1984 as a base level of 100, was the average level of fares charged on London Regional Transport services in December 1984, February 1985 and February 1986.

Mr. David Mitchell: The appropriate base for a comparison of average fares is the last set of fare changes approved by the GLC in May 1983. The following table shows the information the hon. Member seeks, in these terms:

	Cash Fares	Fares, Adjusted in relation to RPI
June 1983	100	100
February 1984	100	97·3
December 1984	100	93·7
February 1985	108·3	100
February 1986	115·1	101·1

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what using February 1984 as a base level of 100, was the cost of an adult off-peak bus fare on London Regional Transport services in December 1984, February 1985 and February 1986;

(2) what, using February 1984 as a base level of 100, was the cost of a child bus fare on London Regional Transport services in December 1984, February 1985 and February 1986.

Mr. David Mitchell: Particular levels of fare are matters for London Regional Transport.

London Underground (Crime Study)

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Transport when the study on crime on the London Underground was first announced; what submissions have been received; and when a report will be published.

Mr. David Mitchell: The study of crime on the Underground was announced on 8 January this year at the Prime Minister's seminar on crime prevention. So far seven submissions have been received from bodies and individuals not directly involved in the study. I expect to receive a report by the end of July.

Heathrow Airport (Security)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport when the new procedures requiring passengers for Israel to queue in the public area of terminal 1, Heathrow airport, commenced; what assessment he has made of the security implications of such passengers being visible in such a public area for a prolonged period of time; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Since the El Al operation was moved to terminal 1 in January, the check-in and security procedures for passengers to Israel have been carried out within a separate area screened off from the public concourse. In recent weeks the security procedures have been stepped up, and I am informed that on occasions the resulting delays have caused the queue to tail back beyond the entrance to the dedicated area. My security advisers will be discussing possible ways of preventing this with the British Airports Authority. In the meantime, the area continues to be kept under careful police surveillance.

North Devon Link Road

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects work to begin on stage 2B of the North Devon link road from South Molton to Barnstaple.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We hope the construction can start next year, subject to satisfactory completion of the remaining statutory procedures.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Benefits (Coventry)

Mr. Park asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many tenants in no-fines dwellings in the Coventry North-East constituency are in receipt of additional heating allowances.

Mr. Major: I regret that the information requested is not available.

District Health Authorities

Mr. Pavitt asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if it remains the policy of Her Majesty's Government that the boundaries of district health authorities shall be conterminous with the local authorities' services; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will make it his policy not to sanction the amalgamation of any two district authorities where the boundaries of the resulting authority would not be conterminous with the local authorities' services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: It is clearly sensible that, wherever possible, health authority boundaries should be conterminous with those of local authorities. I do not think that it would be right to attempt to be prescriptive, however, as there may be good reasons why this might not be feasible or desirable in individual cases.

Statutory Sick Pay Scheme

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans his Department has to review the operation of the statutory sick pay scheme since April 1983 in the light of the criticisms contained in the new report published by the Disability Alliance ERA, Leicester Rights Centre and the Leicester city council low pay campaign, copies of which were sent to him; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Major: I shall let the hon. and learned Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Health Authorities (Expenditure)

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the spending per capita in the Leicester health authority area at the latest available date; and what is the comparable figure for the other health authorities within the Trent region;

(2) what is the spending per capita in the Trent region at the latest available date; and what is the comparable level of spending in the other regions of England and Wales.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let my hon. Friend have replies as soon as possible.

Primary Care (Report)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much it cost to prepare the Binder Hamlyn report on controlling the costs of primary care.

Mr. Hayhoe: £87,400.

Perinatal Mortality

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the latest information available within his Department on perinatal mortality in 1985.

Mr. Whitney: The latest information is given in the table.

Perinatal mortality: number and rate, England and Wales 1985 (provisional)

	*Perinatal deaths	Rate per 1,000 total live and stillbirths
	6,498	9·84

* Perinatal deaths: stillbirths and deaths in the first week of life.

Radiation Levels

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what studies have been made of the amount of radiation recorded in Britain arising from the Chernobyl incident; what assessment has been made, or is to be made, of the implications of that amount of radiation recorded for (i) the future incidence of radiation-induced congenital abnormalities and (ii) the incidence of radiation-induced cancers over the next 30 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: We are advised that the levels of radiation arising from the Chernobyl incident in air, water and milk have been monitored continuously, are very low, and would result in doses to the public well below internationally accepted limits.

For any individual the additional risk of developing radiation-induced cancer is so small as to be negligible and no increase in cases of radiation-induced congenital abnormalities would be expected.

Limited List Prescribing

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the extent and pattern of consumption of drugs no longer prescribable on the National Health Service following his introduction of the limited list.

Mr. Hayhoe: I regret that this information is not available.

Hospitals (Thefts)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will take steps to combat the lack of reporting of thefts in hospitals; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will issue a circular to hospital authorities urging action to make staff aware of the possibility of theft and encouraging them to report all incidents; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Whitney: Steps have already been taken to ensure that all health authorities are aware of the need for effective action to minimise losses through theft, and for staff to play a full part in minimising opportunities for theft and reporting all incidents which do occur. All health authorities have drawn up security strategies, as they were asked to do in health circular HC(82)19. In December 1984 they were sent copies of the NHS security manual prepared by the National Association of Health Authorities. This gives very full practical advice and was commended by the Department in Health notice HN(84)26. Authorities have subsequently been reminded of the importance of preventing theft in their premises and of the need for losses to be recorded accurately. The effectiveness of authorities' security strategies and the application of more rigorous accounting procedures for losses introduced for 1984-85 financial year will be monitored, and further action to secure improvements will be taken where necessary.

Nurses

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of nurses failed to complete their training in the latest year for which statistics are available.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Judicial Reviews

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the number of judicial reviews in which his Department has been involved since 1 March 1974; and on how many occasions the court of final recourse has found against him.

Mr. Major [pursuant to his reply, 28 April 1986, c. 276]: From 1 March 1974 to the end of 1978 there were 54 applications for leave to seek a judicial review and the corresponding proceedings prior to 1977 when judicial review was introduced. From 1979 to date there have been a further 38 applications, but since 1979 the litigation brought against the Department has been dealt with by the solictors' office to the Department and the Treasury Solicitor and the 38 cases are those in which the Department's solicitors' office has been involved. Information about the outcome of proceedings brought between 1974 and 1983 and the number of applications dealt with by the Treasury Solicitor since 1979 is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Information about the outcome of judicial proceedings against the Secretary of State for Social Services since the beginning of 1984 is as follows:

	Heard by court of first instance	Decisions in favour of*	against the Secretary of State
1984	4	3	1
1985	8	4	4
1986	1	1	—

* Decisions given either by the court of first instance or on appeal.

Maternity Allowance

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many of the responses to the consultation on statutory maternity allowance supported the proposals for payment of maternity allowance by employers; and how many opposed it.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 2 May 1986, c. 514]: Of 90 responses received, 10 were broadly favourable; these included the Social Security Advisory Committee and, with some reservations, the Equal Opportunities Commission. Twenty five expressed no overall view. Fifty five were broadly opposed; these included the CBI and the TUC. The revised proposals for the statutory maternity pay scheme sought to take account to the comments received, including in particular the concern expressed that the original proposals would have led to firms having to operate two separate schemes for income-replacement during maternity absence.

Disabled People (Motor Cars)

Mr. Lewis Carter-Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the expert individuals and organisations in the field of road transport and disability whom he consulted regarding the issue of automatic gear boxes for right leg amputees; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 6 May 1986, c. 76]: The British Limbless Ex-Service Men's Association, Motability and Banstead Place Mobility Centre have been consulted about the issue of automatic gear boxes to right leg amputees.

When a war pensioner receiving war pensioner's mobility supplement obtains a car through Motability, the Department can make a grant for adaptations, including the provision of an automaic gear box, provided they are medically essential to enable him to drive. We appreciate the view of the organisations we have consulted that right leg amputees would find an automatic gear box helpful, but the possibility of hand-operated controls means that it cannot be said to be medically essential in all cases. We do, however, give each individual application careful and sympathetic consideration.

Iodine Tablets

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) who holds stocks of iodine tablets;

(2) how many iodine tablets are in stock per head of population and per head of population under the age of 18 years.

Mr. Whitney [pursuant to his reply, 8 May 1986, c. 233]: Stocks of potassium iodate tablets are held at all nuclear installations and at some nearby police stations and hospitals. These are specifically for issue to staff and to people living in the vicinity should an accident occur in which radioactive iodine is released.

Small stocks of potassium iodide tablets are held by the manufacturer and some pharmacists and hospitals for medical purposes unrelated to an accidental release of radioactive materials.

In excess of 2 million potassium iodate tablets are held to issue to people in the vicinity of a serious nuclear accident which releases radioactive iodine while they are being evacuated.

SCOTLAND

Road Traffic Offences

Mr. Robin Cook asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing (a) for Scotland and (b) for the sheriffdom of Linlithgow (i) the number of convictions for road traffic offences resulting in death or serious injury and (ii) a breakdown on sentences of conviction for such offences by fine, community services order and custodial sentences.

Mr. John MacKay: Information on causing death by reckless driving is given in the table. Offences where serious injury results cannot be separately identified.

PSA Development, Coatbridge

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he proposes to reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Monklands, West of 22 April relating to the Property Services Agency development at South Circular Road/Exchange Place, Coatbridge.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. and learned Friend replied to the hon. Member on Thursday 8 May 1986.

Derelict Land

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 3 February, Official Report, column 54, if the joint exercise between his Department and local authorities on cataloguing derelict land in Scotland will include a separate calculation of the amount of derelict land attributable to coal mining activities; when the exercise will be completed; and when he expects to publish figures.

Mr. Ancram: As I explained in answer to the previous question to which the hon. Member has referred, the purpose of the joint exercise which the Scottish Development Department has been conducting with local authorities is to assess what information is available on vacant, derelict and underused land. It is now clear that the information held by local authorities is not comprehensive nor consistently calculated, and accordingly the Scottish Development Agency, in conjunction with the Scottish Development Department, has recently commissioned consultants to consider preparing, and testing, a methodology for use by local authorities generally, in conjunction with the agency, for the collection, analysis and updating of data on the extent of vacant, derelict and underused land in their areas. The consultancy will be completed later this year, but at this stage it is not possible to indicate when any revised system of recording vacant, derelict and underused land might be implemented or what detailed information such a system might provide.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what total acreage of reclaimed derelict land in Scotland in 1975, and for each subsequent year to 1985, has been attributable to coal mining activities;

(2) how much derelict land has been reclaimed by regional area in Scotland for each year from 1975 to 1985; how much funding was available for each year; and if any year was underspent.

Mr. Allan Stewart: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon a possible.

Radiation Levels

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what the levels of background radiation for each region of Scotland have been on a daily basis; and what are normal radiation levels, from the period when the fallout from Chernobyl first reached Scotland to the latest available date.

Mr. Ancram: Information is not available in the form requested. In normal circumstances environmental dose rates vary significantly from one part of Scotland to another according to several factors, including the local geology. Typical values are in the range 0·05 to 0·15 micro-Sievert/hour. The levels at four locations where regular measurements have been made as part of the surveillance of the fallout from the Chernobyl accident are as set out:

Location	3 May	4 May	5 May	6 May	7 May	8 May
TORNESS
East Lothian	0·10*	0·11	0·11	0·10	0·10	—

Caithness	0·15	0·25	—	0·25	0·20	—

Locati	3 May	4 May	5 May	6 May	7 May	8 May
CHAPELCROSS
Dumfries & Galloway	0·10	0·25	—	—	—	0·25

*Figures are in micro-Sieverts per hour.

The results show the increase due to the activity deposited on the ground. This increase is attributable mainly to short-lived radioactivity and is of little significance in terms of doses to people and animals.

Opencast Mining

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list by site and county all opencast coalmining applications received since 1 January 1984, stating in each case whether authorisation has been granted, refused or is still pending; and if he will list separately for each approved case, and for each refused or as yet unauthorised case, the tonnage per year to be mined and the time period requested or authorised.

Mr. Ancram: The information requested is as follows:

Area	Site	Tonnage and period*	Status
Motherwell District	Fernieshaw	67,000 tonnes to be worked for a period of three years	Authorised
Falkirk District	Roughcastle	190,000 tonnes to be worked for a period of four years	Authorised
Dumfries and Galloway District	Libry Moor	1·7 million tonnes to be worked for a period of nine years	Authorised
Dunfermline District	Thornyhill	450,000 tonnes to be worked for a period of three years	Pending

* The tonnages authorised are for the whole period of authorisation. Tonnages per year have not been stipulated.

ENVIRONMENT

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what discussions he has had with the water and district authorities in those areas where the four proposed nuclear waste sites are located;

(2) what recent consultations he has had with representatives of local bodies in the areas currently being investigated as potential nuclear waste disposal sites;

(3) whether he has now held consultations with the local government authorities covering the four disposal sites suggested by NIREX.

Mrs. Rumbold: All county and district authorities, and the water authority, within whose areas a site falls, have been consulted on the draft of the special development order intended to authorise site investigations. Other bodies were also consulted. My right hon. and hon. Friends and I have also met affected local authorities and protest groups. Further meetings are planned.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what the cost is to Her Majesty's Government of carrying out exploratory work on the potential nuclear waste sites.

Mr. Waldegrave: The direct cost of carrying out exploratory work will be met by NIREX. My Department will be commissioning independent analysis of the results of the explorations. This is likely to cost approximately £1 million over the next year. It is too soon to estimate the cost of assessments beyond that.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to provide for the creation of local liaison committee including county council representatives at some stage during the selection of nuclear waste disposal sites; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: We have no proposals for such legislation. As we have said in our first stage response to the Environment Committee's report on radioactive waste, the Government would encourage NIREX, local authorities and other representative groups concerned to discuss the form and role of such a committee once a particular site has been chosen for development.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to which local or water authorities monitor the effects of low-level radioactive waste in their areas.

Mrs. Rumbold: In England, monitoring of the environmental effects of authorised disposals of low level radioactive waste is undertaken by the Department of the Environment and by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. Water authorities take samples of drinking water from their own sources and these samples are sent for analysis on behalf of my Department's radiochemical inspectorate. Further environmental monitoring in the vicinity of authorised disposal sites is carried out as appropriate, either by or on behalf of the inspectorate.

Local and water authorities are, of course, free to undertake their own monitoring programmes and to retain the results.

Mr. Lyell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what volume of radioactive nuclear waste, differentiating between low level waste and intermediate level waste, arising prior to the year 2030 will arise from the decommissioning of power stations.

Mrs. Rumbold: The amount of radioactive waste produced to 2030 from the decommissioning of nuclear power plants is expected to be about 101,000 tonnes, practically all of which will be low level waste. Figures in terms of volume are not yet available. Further details are given in research report number DOE/RW/85-124.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which countries were visited by Ministers in his Department during 1984-85 and 1985-86; and what was the total cost of each visit.

Radiation

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the dosage limits for radiation beyond which it is considered harmful for human beings to suffer exposure.

Mrs. Rumbold: On the grounds of prudence it is generally assumed there is no threshold level for the effects of exposure to radiation. However, international recommendations permit exposures up to 1 milli-Sievert per year on average throughout life with a possibility of 5 milli-Sievert per year for a short period. The risk to any individual from exposures at these levels is considered to be negligible.

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is considered to be the normal level of background radiation in the atmosphere so far as the United Kingdom is concerned.

Mrs. Rumbold: Normal background radiation in the United Kingdom varies between 0·1 and 0·3 micro-Sieverts per hour depending on the geological formations in the area. About one third of this radiation dose is associated with radioactivity in air; primarily radon thoron and their decay products from natural radioactivity in the earth.

Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the highest level of background radiation recorded in the United Kingdom since the Chernobyl accident.

Mrs. Rumbold: The highest level of radiation reported by the NRPB was 1 micro-Sievert per hour for a brief period at two places in Cumbria and one in north Wales on Saturday 3 May 1986.

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has of the amount of total potential fallout from Chernobyl.

Mr. Waldegrave: It is not possible to estimate the total potential fallout until the Russian authorities release further technical details.

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will compare the normal levels of background radiation with those levels of radiation recorded on Friday 2 May, Saturday 3 May, Sunday 4 May, Monday 5 May and Tuesday 6 May at Dounreay, Darlington, Didcot and Dulwich; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will provide the specific daily readings taken at each monitoring location identified by name throughout the United Kingdom for separate levels of iodine 131, tellurium 132, iodine 132, ruthenium 103 and caesium 137, from 25 April to the latest available date; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will publish the level of radioactive traces in rainwater for each area of the United Kingdom for each day from Friday 2 May to Wednesday 7 May.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will ask the National Radiological Protection Board to publish all the detailed readings of radiation levels available to it over the past two weeks.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he has taken to monitor regularly radioactivity levels in the north of England and Scotland in the light of the Chernobyl incident; what steps he has taken to inform and protect the public in the present situation; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold [pursuant to the replies, 8 May 1986]: I refer the hon. Members to the statement made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment in the House on 6 May 1986 at column 21. Samples have been taken daily, and since last Friday 2 May daily bulletins have been issued by the NRPB after consultation with Government Departments. Extensive monitoring will continue and its results will be made available to the public and the House. Because the information requested is so bulky it is being made available through the press offices in my Department, the Department of Health and Social Security and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

London Skyline

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment with whom responsibility now lies for decisions regarding photogrametric records of London's skylines and sensitivity to high buildings maps; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: The records are in the care of the London Residuary Body until arrangements can be made for their transfer to the London Planning Advisory Committee.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has anything to add to the answer of 30 November 1984, Official Report, columns 611-12 concerning the net reduction of 8,000 posts in local government as a whole following abolition of the Greater London council and the metropolitan county councils; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: My right hon. Friend has nothing to add to that statement at this stage.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply of 1 May, Official Report, column 485, if he will state the total projected amount likely to be made available by the London Residuary Body for redundancy payments following abolition of the Greater London Council.

Mr. Tracey: The London Residuary Body's budget for 1986-87 provides for £35 million to cover all compensation payments. It is still too early to estimate the amount for redundancy payments.

London Marathon Board

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply of 1 May, Official Report, column 487, what has been the total estimated cost of support given by Her Majesty's Government in each year to the London Marathon Board.

Mr. Tracey: The Department of the Environment has charged no facility fee for the use of the Royal Parks for part of the London marathon, although it requires the London Marathon Board to reimburse the net costs of additional works and facilities provided in the parks specifically for the marathon.

London Residuary Body

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply of 2 May, Official Report, column 506, if he will give details of the matters relevant to the London Residuary Body's functions under the Local Government Act 1985 which were discussed at the meeting on 23 April between his officials and the London Residuary Body.

Mr. Tracey: The matters discussed are amongst those set out in my answers to the hon. Member of 21 April at columns 66-67.

Soviet Nuclear Accident

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what scientific evidence is available to him to account for the absence of traces of plutonium in the fallout from the Chernobyl nuclear reactor in the Soviet Union.

Mrs. Rumbold: No direct scientific evidence is available to account for the absence of plutonium in the fallout observed in western Europe. However, significant emission of plutonium would be expected only if very high temperatures were reached during such an accident and it may be that high enough temperatures have not been attained.

Protected Planning Zones

Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will seek to amend the Housing and Planning Bill to establish protected planning zones in which central Government have ultimate planning control; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Tracey: We are satisfied with the basic structure of responsibility for planning control under the planning Acts and do not consider that in most cases development control needs to be in the hands of my right hon. Friend rather than of the local planning authority. In so far as they are material to the particular case, the local planning authority must have regard in reaching its decisions to the planning policies of my right hon. Friend as expressed in circulars and other published statements, and to the provisions of the structure plan approved by him.

Nuclear Dumps

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether he has had consultations with the Food Manufacturers' Association about the siting of nuclear dumps;

(2) whether he has received representations from or held consultations with any section of the fishing industry about the siting of nuclear waste dumps.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have had no such consultations. If the Food Manufacturers' Association or the fishing industry has views to offer, I shall be pleased to give them careful consideration.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has taken on extra staff to deal with correspondence arising from the NIREX nuclear dump proposals.

Mr. Waldegrave: No.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) pursuant to the answer of 28 April, Official Report, column 321, what effect his decision to limit the disposal of nuclear waste at NIREX sites to low level waste will have on the future disposal of reprocessing wastes at NIREX sites;

(2) pursuant to the answer of 28 April, Official Report, column 321, whether the reprocessing wastes referred to include materials contaminated in the course of reprocessing but which do not originate as waste for reprocessing;

(3) how many letters and petition signatures for and against the siting of a nuclear waste dump he has received in the month of April from each of the four areas short-listed by NIREX;

(4) if he will reply to the letter to him from Councillor S. J. Norton of 38 Melrose Way, Grimsby, South Humberside, about the South Killingholme potential nuclear waste disposal site in sufficient time for the councillor to have a reasonable opportunity to reply before the special development order is laid; and if he will make a statement;

(5) if he will make it his policy to reply to the letter to him from Councillor A. M. Webster of 66 Caistor Drive, Grimsby, South Humberside, about the South Killingholme proposed nuclear waste disposal site in sufficient time for the councillor to have a reasonable opportunity to reply before the special develpment order is laid; and if he will make a statement;

(6) if he will make it his policy to reply to Councillor J. F. Orchard of 8 Worsley Close, Immingham, South Humberside, about the South Killingholme potential nuclear waste disposal site in sufficient time for the recipient to have a reasonable opportunity to reply before the special development order is laid; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall answer these questions shortly.

Radiation Levels

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what the levels of background radiation for each county have been on a daily basis; and what are normal background radiation levels, from the period when the fallout from Chernobyl first reached England and Wales to the latest available date.

Mrs. Rumbold: Normal background radiation in the United Kingdom varies between 0·1 and 0·3 micro-Sieverts per hour. Radionuclides such as the isotopes of iodine and caesium would not normally be present. Since Friday 2 May samples have been taken regularly at monitoring stations throughout the United Kingdom and daily bulletins have been issued by the NRPB after consultation with Government Departments. Because this information is so bulky it is being made available through the press offices in my Department, the Department of Health and Social Security and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 12 May 1986

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Land Registry

Mr. Chris Smith asked the Attorney-General whether he intends to bring forward measures to open the land registry to public scrutiny.

The Attorney-General: The hon. Member is presumably referring to the Law Commission's proposals in the report No. 148 on land registration, "Inspection of the Register". I refer the Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) on 6 May last at column 1.

Merthyr Tydfil County Court

Mr. Rowlands asked the Attorney-General what is the average time that a litigant has to wait from making an application for (a) maintenance and (b) access to his or her child to be heard before the registrar at the Merthyr Tydfil county court.

The Attorney-General: The average waiting time for appointments before the registrar at Merthyr Tydfil county court is 10-11 weeks for maintenance hearings and 13-14 weeks for access hearings. If the hon. Member is concerned about delay in any particular case I would ask him to draw it to the attention of the Lord Chancellor so that inquiries may be made.

PRIME MINISTER

European Council

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister whether she is satisfied with the preparations which have been made for the next meeting of the European Council; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: As I explained in my answer on 4 March the next European Council will be held on 26-27 June, and it is for the Dutch Presidency to make the necessary arrangements.

Soviet Union (Nuclear Accident)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister when she was first informed officially that British scientists were in contact with their Russian counterparts about the Chernobyl disaster.

The Prime Minister: I am not responsible for such contacts.

Top Salary Posts

Ms. Richardson asked the Prime Minister if she will (a) list the posts which fall within her scope of the top salary review, (b) list such posts currently held by women and (c) publish the number of such posts held by women and their proportion of the total for each of the last five years for which figures are available.

The Prime Minister: The remit of the Top Salaries Review Body covers senior civil servants, senior members of the Armed Forces and the Judiciary. The numbers of men and women occupying posts covered by the TSRB over the past 5 years is as follows:

	Home Civil Service*			†Armed Forces			‡Judiciary
	Male	Female	Total	Male	Female	Total	Male	Female	Total
1 January 1982	704	32	736	226	0	226	668	19	687
1 January 1983	663	31	694	221	0	221	743	21	764
1 January 1984	653	28	681	210	0	210	685	25	710

1 January 1986	634	26	660	208	0	208	801	31	‖832

* Includes Grades 1,2 and 3 (formerly Permanent Secretary, Deputy Secretary and Under Secretary).
† The TSRB covers Major General and equivalent and above.
‡ Refers to England and Wales only.
‖ Includes 9 Social Security Commissioners and 50 Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

United States Visitors (Safety)

Mr. Favell asked the Prime Minister what discussions she had with President Reagan during the recent economic summit in Tokyo about efforts by the United States Administration to encourage Americans to visit Britain and to ensure that accurate information is available to potential United States visitors to Britain about their safety.

The Prime Minister: We are doing all we can to persuade American tourists that it is safe to visit the United Kingdom. We have drawn the attention of President Reagan and of senior officials in his Administration to the importance of this: they have made a number of helpful statements.

Anglo-Irish Agreement

Mr. A. Cecil Walker asked the Prime Minister what criteria she proposes to use in deciding whether to invoke the provisions of article 11 of the Anglo-Irish agreement relating to a review or revocation of the agreement.

The Prime Minister: The Anglo-Irish agreement provides under article 11 that the working of the intergovernmental conference shall be reviewed after three years and that it may be reviewed earlier if either the United Kingdom or Irish Government wish. I have made it clear that if there were agreement upon proposals for devolved government we should need to review the implications of any such proposals for the working of the intergovernmental conference. I cannot foresee other circumstances in which we might need to review the working of the conference befoe the end of the three-year period.

Mr. A. Cecil Walker asked the Prime Minister over what time scale Her Majesty's Government propose to judge the extent to which the Anglo-Irish agreement has fulfilled the objectives set for it.

The Prime Minister: We cannot expect the Anglo-Irish agreement to achieve its objectives overnight, and it would be wrong to prescribe time scales. I am, nevertheless, encouraged by the purposeful start that has been made on the range of matters, not least in co-operation on security.

Legislation

Mr. A. Cecil Walker asked the Prime Minister if she will make it the policy of Her Majesty's Government that in future all legislation relating to Great Britain which is currently extended to Northern Ireland by subsequent Orders in Council applies directly to Northern Ireland; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Sir J. Biggs-Davison) on 13 March at column 544.

Prevention of Terrorism Act

Mr. J. Enoch Powell asked the Prime Minister how the administration of the Prevention of Terrorism Act will be affected by the undertaking given at the Tokyo conference by France, West Germany, Japan, Canada, Italy and the United States of America not to admit to their respective territories persons excluded from the United Kingdom under that Act.

The Prime Minister: The administration of the Act will not be affected.

WALES

Opencast Mining

Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list by site and county all opencast coalmining applications received since 1 January 1984, stating, in each case, whether authorisation has been granted, refused or is still pending; and if he will list separately for each approved, refused or as yet unauthorised case, the tonnage per year to be mined or proposed to be mined and the time-period requested or authorised.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Since 1 January 1984, four applications for authorisation have been made to me. No decision has yet been taken in any case. The information requested is given in the following table:

Opencast Coalmining—Applications Made to Secretary of State for Wales

County	Site	Time (Years)	Annual Years (tonnes)
Clwyd	Ley Farm, Chirk	2½	45,200
	Ashfield House Farm, Ewloe	1½	33,333
Dyfed	Garnant	5	80,000
Powys/West Glamorgan	Nant Helen, Ystradgynlais	11	254,545

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the total number of smears for cervical cancer examined in Wales for each year since 1970.

Mr. Mark Robinson: The required information is provided in relevant volumes of "Health and Personal Social Services Statistics for Wales", copies of which are in the Library. The latest available figures relate to 1984, and are contained in issue No. 12 of the publication.

Sheep Annual Premium Payments

Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Wales which breeds of ewe in Wales and which areas of Wales are currently eligible for sheep annual premium payments.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: All breeds of ewe in all areas of Wales are currently eligible for sheep annual premium payments, subject to all other conditions of the scheme being satisfied.
